'Light' foods not necessarily low in calories

United Press International
COLUMBIA, Mo. — The "light" trend in food and beverages may be an exercise in self-delusion, says a University of Missouri-Columbia faculty member.

Donald L. Shawver says

"light" pancake syrup may have fewer calories than regular, but pancakes still are pancakes. And, he adds, national advertisements for "light" tacos say in small print they are no lower in calories than regular tacos.

Shawver, who is marketing department chairman for the College of Business and Public Administration, says American marketers who emphasize natural, "light" products may be giving consumers what they want instead of manipulating them into thinking their new product is really what they need.
