Israeli president decides

Shamir to lead government

JERUSALEM — Yitzhak Shamir was chosen Wednesday to form Israel's next government, virtually assuring the continuation of Prime Minister Menachem Begin's hardline leadership.

President Chaim Herzog formally asked the 67-year-old foreign minister to lead Israel's next administration, giving him 21 days to present his Likud-led coalition to the Knesset, or parliament, for approval.

Roni Milo, the coalition parliamentary whip, said a new government could be formed within a week. Shamir has the support of all six parties in Begin's coalition, ensuring him of up to 64 of the 120 votes in parliament.

Herzog and Shamir telephoned Begin from the president's office before making the announcement.

"I asked him for his advice and guidance in the future," Shamir said about Begin. "He promised to stand by me, whenever I ask him to."

Begin is expected to remain caretaker prime minister until the next government is formed, even though the 70-year-old leader has been ailing and has not left his home in more than two weeks.

Responding to demands from several coalition parliamentarians for a national unity government made up of all major Knesset factions, Shamir invited the opposition Labor Party to join his new government.

"We have problems of security, political problems, economic problems and I think we'll succeed to solve these problems with common efforts—if we will have a government which will have the support of all the Knesset," he said.

Shamir, who speaks eight languages, was expected to remain in the foreign minister's slot. An admirer of the late Chinese communist leader Mao Tse-tung, Shamir spent 10 years as a key operative in Israel's Mossad intelligence service.

On Lebanon, the prime minister-designate has said he would maintain Begin's demand for a simultaneous withdrawal of Israeli, Syrian and Palestine Liberation Organization forces from the war-torn country.

His government would continue unrestricted Jewish settlements in the occupied West Bank.
