Exotics

A cheetah, for example, was brought in to be treated for renal stones.

"The zoos are more equipped to handle large exotic animals," Watkins said. "We primarily work with difficult cases. Admittedly, we don't have the expertise in handling really wild animals. However, we do have specialists in the field of orthopedics for animals."

Recently, an Addax, a wild antelope, was brought in by a private ranch to be treated for a broken elbow.

A&M often works closely with several of the larger zoos. A giraffe from the Fort Worth Zoo was brought in to be treated for an infected joint last year. Also, a camel was treated for a bone cyst in his stifle. The college also has worked on an elephant in the last few years.

Aside from routine treatments, research — which requires the use of exotic animals — is continuous in the college of veterinary medicine. One such example is the colony of marmosets — a small tropical monkey. This research currently is being conducted under the direction of Dr. Franklin Stein, associate professor of veterinary anatomy.

The colony was initiated in 1975. Funded by the National Institute of Health, the colony was started with the intention of developing a two-species colony of marmosets: one fairly common species and one endangered species. The colonies eventually would be used for research.

Since the first of September, the research has shifted gears. The research is funded at this time by the Institute of Comparative Medicine, and currently is directed at finding a cure for the disease, AIDS.

"AIDS closely parallels a naturally occurring disease in marmosets," Stein said. "We hope to transmit AIDS to the marmosets and find if there's a treatment," he said.

One hundred and twenty marmosets are used in the research. They are caged in indoor/outdoor pens on the veterinary research farm. They are small and easy to work with.

"We handle the marmosets with leather gloves," Stein said. "They're semi-tame. There's no such thing as a tame marmoset."

The marmosets are expensive to work with, Stein said. "It costs us $1.25 per day per monkey. This includes personnel, facilities and a specialized diet for the marmosets."
