Court to hear cable TV case

United Press International
WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court, for the first time taking a case that could govern the content of cable television programming, agreed Monday to decide if a state can ban liquor advertisements on cable.

The case, which centers on an appeal by cable groups challenging a Oklahoma law, could produce a ruling that also will affect "super-stations" transmitted by cable companies and newspapers carrying certain types of advertising, such as liquor.

Cable companies claim the ban violates the First Amendment guarantee of free speech, but Oklahoma officials have successfully argued the state's interest in shielding its citizens from ads for liquor and wine outweighs any free speech rights of cable networks.

Broadcast and newspaper groups warned the court that allowing states to place blanket bans on truthful advertising of lawful products could deprive cable television of vital financial support, and could be extended to ban certain advertising from newspapers.

The burgeoning cable television industry serves more than 31 million households.

Much of the programming offered by cable television systems in Oklahoma originates outside the state. It includes commercial television from stations in neighboring Kansas, Missouri and Texas, as well as signals of independent stations such as WTBS, Ted Turner's Atlanta-based "super-station" transmitted via satellite to cable operators.

The programming includes commercials for wine. Although the sale and consumption of alcoholic beverages is lawful in Oklahoma, it is illegal to advertise liquor within the state, except at retail stores.

Under a 1977 state supreme court ruling, Oklahoma stations follow the liquor advertising ban. At the same time, newspapers and magazines printed outside the state that carry such advertising can be sold in the state.

For a number of years, cable operators were allowed to carry out-of-state programming containing wine commercials. But in March 1980, the Oklahoma attorney general said carrying such wine commercials on cable television was against state law, and all violators would face criminal prosecution.

Sea grant director named to council

Feenan D. Jennings, director of the Sea Grant College Program and the Office of University Research Services at Texas A&M, has been appointed to the Texas Coastal and Marine Council by Gov. Mark White. Jennings succeeds Dr. John C. Calhoun Jr., deputy chancellor for engineering emeritus for the Texas A&M System.

The 16 members of the marine council serve six-year, staggered terms and are appointed by the governor, the lieutenant governor and the speaker of the Texas House of Representatives. Representing government, education, business, industry and the public, members serve as an advisory group on coastal and marine issues in Texas and evaluate current and potential marine-related problems for consideration by the Legislature.

Jennings, Sea Grant director since 1978, formerly headed the National Science Foundation's Office for International Decade of Ocean Exploration in Washington.

He also has served as acting director of the Division of Ocean Sciences and deputy director of the Ocean Science and Technology Division, both with NSF. He chaired both the National Academy of Sciences' Committee on storm surges from hurricanes and the organization's committee to study regional oceanography programs for the Department of Energy.

History department offers film series

The Department of History is offering a film series on the American West for the fall semester. Tonight's presentation, "Hombre" starring Paul Newman and Richard Boone, will begin at 7 in 100 Harrington. The films will be held each Tuesday and are free and open to the public. The series is designed to supplement the regular instructional program. Each film is introduced by a member of the history faculty who will place the movie in historical perspective.
