Roommate

other students, he must go out on his own to meet people."

"I feel like those with the most conflicts are freshman," says Steve Potz-Nielsen, head resident for Hart hall. "When a freshman rooms with an upper-classman, they sometimes have a hard time adjusting. The senior, in his final semester, may be carrying just a few hours, while the freshman probably has a full load and has not developed good study habits."

What should roommates do when they can't work problems out among themselves?

"The first time a student is unable to get a point across to his roommate, he feels frustrated, he can't sleep, he throws a pie in his roommate's face..." Ludwig said, "That's when they need to come in for counseling."

"The first thing I do is find out what the problem is," Ludwig said. "Then I find out why it's a problem and why the other roommate doesn't approve. And then I ask them how they'd solve the problem; what limits they'd put on their roommate."

Typically, the problem is lack of communication.

"Take argument for instance. Some students come from homes where argument is a real part of their lifestyle. That's how they communicate," Ludwig said. "To others, argument may only involve a family discussion."

It can be a growing experience for roommates to learn to work through these sort of problems.

Problems for off-campus students differ somewhat from on campus students.

"In the dorm, your bedroom is also your living room," said Kathy Bartholomew, head resident for Haas hall. "One roommate may be very sociable while the other needs to study a lot. There are conflicts on how to use the room. Some study with a radio and t.v., some bring friends over."

Roommate problems tend to be especially concentrated during times of pressure and stress. During exams, dead week and finals is the worst time. Depression often sets in around mid-terms.

"We handle 25 to 30 roommate conflicts per month at the Off Campus Center," Ludwig said.

In addition to counseling roommate problems, Ludwig works with legal problems in which two students are involved and assists students in understanding what a lease is all about. She also is adviser to Off Campus Aggies and serves as a student development specialist.
