$45,000 grant blocked for Brown prosecution

United Press International
AUSTIN — A federal court judge Thursday temporarily blocked the state from providing a $45,000 grant to help prosecute convict Eroy Brown, who faces a third trial on charges of killing a prison official.

Washington said Brown — an indigent — has no money to pay his lawyers.

The lawyers, in a complaint filed with Nowlin, said Brown has been denied his constitutional rights to full legal representation.

in seeing that justice is done."

But White told reporters at his weekly news conference Thursday that Brown's attorneys will eventually be reimbursed for the two earlier trials.

U.S. District Judge James Nowlin of Austin set a hearing for 10 a.m. next Thursday to consider an injunction against the state.

Brown, 32, of Waco, is scheduled to go on trial Dec. 5 in Edinburg for the April 1981 slaying of Billy Max Moore, who was a farm manager at the Texas Department of Correction's Ellis Unit in Walker County.

The defendant's lawyers said their client has been denied his constitutional rights to full legal representation.

Walker County officials originally asked the state for $150,000 to help pay for Brown's third trial since the county had spent more than $100,000 on the first two trials.

"They moderated the amount they asked for and we granted that sum of money," said White.

One of Brown's lawyers, Sen. Craig Washington, D-Houston, said it is unfair for the state to provide money to prosecutors when Brown's defense team has not been paid some $225,000 in fees from the two earlier trials.

Washington said the state grant by Gov. Mark White's Criminal Justice Division "makes it clear that they are not interested

White said the state may be willing to help finance a third trial because the prosecutors believe they have a case and ought to be able to present it to a jury.

Immigration service fair, attorney says

United Press International
BROWNSVILLE — A Justice Department attorney told a federal judge Thursday that U.S. immigration policy should not be dictated by the level of violence in countries where hundreds of illegal immigrants are coming from.

malans they have a right to request political asylum.

Attorney Allen Hauseman said in his final argument that there is "not a single shred of evidence" to support claims in a class-action suit that the Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) has been discriminating against Salvadorans and Guatemalans.

Hinojosa gave the attorneys of both sides until Nov. 4 to file additional briefs in the case. He did not indicate when he would issue his ruling.

"What happens in Salvador, Guatemala, Grenada or Iran cannot determine rights in America," Hauseman told U.S. District Judge Ricardo Hinojosa, who must decide whether to permanently order the INS to advise Salvadorans and Guate-Atorney Lee Teran of San Antonio argued that INS officials at a detention facility on the South Texas coast which houses 500 Central Americans have made it difficult for the aliens to obtain legal assistance. They also coerced them into signing voluntary departure forms without fully advising them of their rights, she said.

Teran argued that in the fall of 1981, after an influx of Central Americans began crossing the Rio Grande, INS officials began curtailing telephone contacts, confiscating writing and legal materials, and making it more difficult for attorneys to visit the aliens.

Hall Boldin, director of the INS district headquartered at nearby Harlingen, appeared as the government's final witness and testified in response to Hinojosa's questions that measures were being implemented to satisfy all the complaints contained in the lawsuit. He assured Hinojosa he would make every effort to obtain self-help legal materials in Spanish for the first time, and to ensure the lawyers were afforded plenty of time and privacy to advise their clients.

Supporters of the lawsuit, including Proyecto Libertad (Project Liberty), contend the United States has discriminated against Central Americans in the granting of political asylum, while readily giving asylum to people such as Russian ballet dancers and athletes.

Pipeline oil goes in lake

United Press International
TISHOMINGO, Okla. — Environmental Protection Agency officials said Thursday about 50,000 gallons of oil have spewed out of a ruptured pipeline in the Washita River in southern Oklahoma, and are spreading into Lake Texoma.

Roger Meachum, a spokesman for the EPA in Dallas, said the spill occurred Wednesday when a pipeline leading to the Kerr-McGee refinery near Wynnewood in Garvin County ruptured, dumping oil in the flood-swollen river.

Meachum said about 1,000 barrels of oil escaped into the river before officials at the refinery shut off the line.

Pat Petree, a State Corporation Commission spokesman, said the oil had reached the mouth of the river in Johnston County and was flowing into the man-made lake.

Federal and state game officials met with State Corporation Commission workers to assess possible environmental damage.

Owners list brings flood of claims

United Press International
AUSTIN — State Treasurer Ann Richards said Thursday her office has received more than 5,000 calls and 10,000 pieces of mail since publishing the names of people and organizations listed as owners of unclaimed money.

The list of 20,000 people and organizations who have $50 or more in unclaimed funds was published Oct. 16 in 35 newspapers and was also distributed to more than 600 public libraries.

Under state law, bank accounts or other types of accounts abandoned or unclaimed must be turned over to the treasurer, who in turn is responsible for finding the owners.

Richards said half of the calls to a special toll-free number were the owners of unclaimed funds.

Approximately $439,000 in funds have been made since the program to find the recipients was launched Oct. 5, Richards said.
