High dioxin level found in streets

United Press International
NEWARK, New Jersey — Residents of Newark's Ironbound area said Thursday that dioxin contamination increased around a defunct Agent Orange plant after the state began vacuuming neighborhood streets.

The Ironbound Health Rights Advisory Commission said it reached that conclusion upon analyzing a report released by the state Department of Environmental Protection. A lawsuit was filed this summer for access to state records.

The commission charged at a news conference that the actions taken by the state to protect residents have been inadequate and the cleanup efforts have failed.

The study by a private contractor, NUS Corp., showed 15 of 19 sectors sampled before the cleanup contained dioxin, while 17 of 19 sectors sampled afterward showed contamination, said Robert Cartwright, commission chairman.

Cartwright said the spread of dioxin could be explained by last month's discovery of a new dioxin hot spot at the Brady Iron and Metal Corp., where levels up to 3,300 parts per billion were detected. One ppb is considered dangerous.

The scrap metal company is believed to have salvaged reactor vessels from the former Diamond Alaki Co., a one-time producer of the Vietnam War defoliant Agent Orange. Traffic in and out of the Brady site, as well as wind and rain, could account for the recontamination of the area, he said.

Since large-scale dioxin contamination was first discovered at the Diamond site in June, the firm's successor, Diamond Shamrock of Dallas, has paid for fencing and tarpaulins to secure the site.

Michael Gordon, an attorney for the group, charged the state is not moving fast enough or aggressively enough to force Diamond Shamrock to assume responsibility for a major cleanup of the neighborhood. He also said the state has failed to conduct health tests of the residents.

"They're trying to portray themselves as the knights in white suits, taking baby steps when they should be running a marathon," he said.

Gordon said Diamond Shamrock has the financial and technological capability to solve the problem. If the state does not act soon, he said, the Ironbound residents will return to court to force some action.
