U.S. nurse aids Lebanese

United Press International
TRIPOLI, Lebanon — Amid the rockets and bullets in Tripoli, an American Florence Nightingale tends to the wounded.

One of Lisa Cantrell's favorite patients at the Red Crescent Hospital, is known only as Ahmed — one of the "RPG kids" of Palestinian guerrilla chief Yasser Arafat. He is 13 and doesn't think he will live to see 16.

He looks like a sweet cuddly child lying there in his hospital cot sleeping. But Ahmed has been a fighter for the Palestine Liberation Organization since he was 10.

He is an expert on RPG's — rocket-propelled grenades — from his days fighting in the Bekaa Valley.

Ahmed is in the hospital a second time, recovering from shrapnel wounds in his foot, along with the 16-, 17- and 18-year-olds who make up the bulk of Arafat's guerrilla army, now trapped in Tripoli and outnumbered by a rebel Palestinian army with Syrian and Libyan firepower.

"This kid is phenomenal. I really love him. He's been fighting three years, but he's pretty depressed now in the hospital because he wants to get back out and fight," says Ms. Cantrell, 32, a volunteer in the Red Crescent's makeshift basement hospital.

She is proud of him, completely separate from the pain of knowing he is a mere boy and has lost three childhood friends, all RPG kids, in the fighting in Lebanon's eastern Bekaa Valley.

Yet, he is not even a Palestinian. He is Lebanese.

"He knows what he's doing. He's not playing a game," she says, recalling the night he stood guard outside the operating room with his pistol to prevent rival Palestinian fighters from rushing in with their Kalashnikov rifles.

"This little one went and got his pistol and stood guard," Ms. Cantrell said. She said her young Lebanese friend warned those who approached that if anyone tried to hurt her, he would shoot them.

"Then at times he is very much the little boy. He came in one Sunday with two little boys one with a sore on his foot. He said they reminded him of his brothers who he really missed.

"When I talked to him one day, he said, 'I don't think I'm gonna live until I'm 16.' What could I say? I told him I see a lot of PLO fighters in their 50s."

Attitudes like that astonish some who don't understand the cause of the most recent Palestinian fighting, she admits. He understanding did not come until she married a Palestinian.

"People ask me how can you work for Palestinians who are fighting among themselves?"

"I don't like the fact they're fighting between themselves but it's a small portion of Palestinians fighting. It's mostly the Syrians and Libyans fighting to enter Tripoli. We know that, so it's not hard to keep working."

Besides nursing, Ms. Cantrell born to American parents in the Virgin Islands, also washes dirt sheets and scrubs floors. A night, she sleeps on a piece of foam plastic in the basement amid her patients. She rarely goes upstairs because of shellin outside.

"The Palestinians can't understand why I'm here either — why I've given up what the conceive of as such a wonderful life in America," says Lisa Cantrell. "Why would anybody do anything for us? They wonder. I depresses me but keeps me here too."

Reagan to talk to Israeli group

United Press International
WASHINGTON — President Reagan met Tuesday with Israeli President Chaim Herzog — a prelude to talks next week designed to strengthen the 35-year-old alliance at a time of instability and violence in the Middle East.

Herzog met with Reagan for about 30 minutes to deliver the Israeli assessment of what he called "the very, very fluid situation in the Middle East" and discuss the possibilities for a further advance in the process of peace.

"I come away from the talk once again reassured about the close relations which exist between Israel and the United States and the commonality of interests that we have in our area," Herzog told reporters.

"The United States," he said, "is the main and most powerful element in the cause of peace today in the Middle East."

Reagan, whose own peace initiative has been stalled since its inception last September, welcomed Herzog to the White House with the pledge: "We have always had and will continue to have good relations with the state of Israel."

Presidential spokesman Larry Speakes said Reagan "reaffirmed to President Herzog our unwavering commitment to Israel's security and noted he is looking forward to his discussions next week with Prime Minister (Yitzhak) Shamir on a full range of issues."

The Reagan-Herzog meeting helped lay the groundwork for a round of more substantive discussions next week between top

U.S. officials, including Reagan and an Israeli delegate headed by Shamir and Defense Minister Moshe Arens.

Undersecretary of State Laurence Eagleburger recently held extensive talks with Israeli officials in Israel. Reagan also expected to consult with Middle East envoy, Donald Rumsfeld, before meeting next week with Shamir.

Rumsfeld was on his way back to Washington Tuesday after completing his first official tour of the Middle East.

Relations between the United States and Israel have not been free of friction, particularly during the tenure of Prime Minister Menachem Begin. Shamir will be making his first visit to Washington since succeeding Begin.

In the background of the preparations for those talks are reports of a new approach by the Reagan administration that would shore up the U.S.-Israel relationship in an effort to break through the tense stalemate that now exists in the peace process especially in Lebanon.

Speakes pointedly noted that Reagan-Herzog meeting came "at a time of increasing Israel-American cooperation," but said his comments were not intended to signal any forthcoming announcements of closer military cooperation.

In the view of some U.S. officials, such a move would reassure Israel about its own security and increase the pressure on Syria to bring greater stability to Lebanon and the region as a whole.

Louisiana creation law loses legislative sponsor

United Press International
SHREVEPORT, La. — Opponents of the state's creation science law will not be able to repeal it because legislators want battles over the controversial issue to be settled in court, the law's author said Tuesday.

State Sen. Bill Keith's comments came in response to statements by at least one senator and a civil liberties union official that Keith's defeat in a re-election bid would make the law an easy target for repeal.

Keith, D-Mooringsport, lost in a runoff last Saturday to Shreveport city councilman Gregory Tarver. Keith pushed the creation science law through the Legislature in 1981, but it has remained tied up in court battles.

The law requires schools teaching Darwin's Theory of Evolution also to instruct students on the biblical version of creation.

"More than likely, legislators are going to want to see it settle in court," Keith said. "This is the opinion I've picked up from many legislators."

The law now sits in the New Orleans court of U.S. District Judge Adrian Duplantier for determination on its constitutionality.

Sen. Sydney Nelson, D-Shreveport, said Keith's defeat may make it easier for opponents to win a repeal of the law.

Martha Kegell, head of the Louisiana arm of the American Civil Liberties Union, said Keith's defeat "clearly sets the stage for a repeal bill."
