An Eye for an Eye...

This society tries to relive part of the renaissance era. They hold fighter practices and often give exhibitions reenacting this time period.

Interns supplement A&M's counseling staff

Qualified counseling psychology students have the chance to work as intern counseling students at the Texas A&M Student Counseling Service along with the regular staff psychologists. The interns are placed under five hours of supervision a week and are required to attend seminars about different areas of counseling.

"We combine experience with intern seminars and supervision to try to give them the information that will help them develop their applied skills," says associate director of counseling and intern training coordinator Paul J. Bradbury.

The weekly 90-minute seminars are designed to provide information on crucial aspects like crisis intervention, psychiatric consultation and career counseling. They also provide a time for interns to learn and discuss special interest topics.

The doctoral level internship program, which was started in 1974, is offered to students seeking a degree in counseling psychology. Initially the interns worked approximately 10 hours a week.

In 1976 the hours were expanded and the internship become a full time position. The interns now work 40 hours a week and receive a salary of $12,500 a year.

There are only four internship positions available at the Student Counseling Service.

"The reason is because we only have funding for four positions and because given our staff size we feel like that's the maximum number we can bring in and give quality supervision to," Bradbury said.

Applicants from around the country competing for these positions must meet several qualifications — they must be a counseling psychology major, pass doctoral qualifying examinations and have dissertation proposals approved prior to beginning the internship.

After these qualifications are met, the five-member Training Committee evaluates the applicants according to their experience and academic background.

Bradbury said important parts of the selection process are the letters of recommendation provided by the applicant and the interview in which they are judged as to how well they communicate during the application process.

This year's interns are Penny Haws from the University of Mississippi, Robert McPherson from the University of Houston, Jane Morgan from Oklahoma State University and Jane Warren from the University of Wyoming.

The Houston Post gets new looks, management

HOUSTON — Bright red banners and a new logo, along with lots of magazine-quality photographs were only a few changes that readers of The new Houston Post noticed Monday in the first edition of the paper under new management.

The 99-year-old newspaper, which was purchased last week by the Toronto Sun for $100 million, looks a great deal different than it has in the past. Some employees at a "coming out" party Sunday compared the paper's new appearance to USA Today.

An eight-inch wide dramatic color photograph from Beirut of a captured American Navy pilot graced the front page, along with a thin, 16-inch-long color picture on the left side of the front page of a stuntman near Houston climbing up a radio transmission tower.

But gone from the pages of The Post was the daily prayer, the ads on section fronts and the buried editorials. Instead, Monday readers saw on the editorial page a large cartoon of Houston Mayor Kathy Whitmire asking if the fire chief's hat comes in woman's sizes and a column by longtime city hall reporter Tom Kennedy about the influence of women in city politics.

The new publisher J.D. Creighton accompanied Mrs.

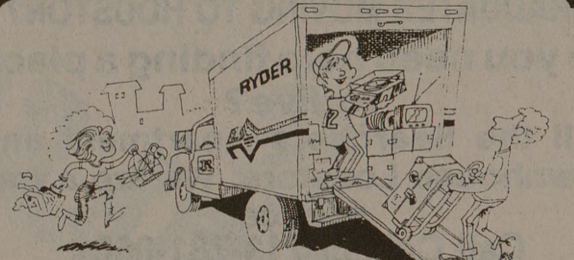

Whitmire Sunday night to the pressroom as the first issues of the new format Post came off the presses.

Editor-in-Chief Peter O'Sullivan said he was pleased with the new look of the paper, but emphasized it still had to be "cleaned up a bit."

"We don't want it to look like a comic book," O'Sullivan said. The front sports page flashes a color picture from Sunday's Houston Oilers game, and inside the section action black-and-white pictures from other NFL games are used. The business section is also in full color, with graphs and charts on the cover.
