Reagan faces criticism for civil rights action

United Press International
CORPUS CHRISTI — Attorney Tony Bonilla Tuesday accused President Reagan of packing the U.S. Civil Rights Commission with "right-wing reactionaries" in the wake of the commission's dramatic reversal on the issue of job discrimination.

Bonilla, head of the Hispanic Leadership Conference which has affiliated with the Rev. Jesse Jackson's "Rainbow Coalition," sharply criticized the Commission's 6-2 vote against use of racial or sex-based quotas to overcome job discrimination.

"I knew it was in the mill," said Bonilla, outspoken past national president of the League of United Latin American Citizens. "You have an administration that was determined to turn back the clock in the area of civil rights."

"The president's insistence that the make-up of the Civil Rights Commission be changed has now confirmed that this administration wants us to go back to the Civil War era when minorities lived on plantations, and the white society called the shots."

"He's got an executive director (Linda Chavez) masquerading as an Hispanic, and he's got some other people who have been masquerading as progressives. Now that they've taken the sheets off, we can see them for what they really are — right-wing reactionaries that are afraid to see minorities move up the ladder of success," Bonilla said.

ATLANTA — Former President Jimmy Carter was "doing very well" Tuesday after minor surgery for hemorrhoids at Emory University Hospital, a spokeswoman said.

Jane Simpson, a spokeswoman for Carter's Atlanta office, said Carter underwent the operation Monday morning. She said there were no complications and "he's doing fine."

Hospital spokeswoman Sylvia Wrobel labeled the operation "minor surgery."

"This morning I was told he was doing very well," Wrobel said. "They're trying to treat him like they would other patients. For Emory to even say he had surgery is a big concession on their part."

Carter, 59, was admitted to the hospital Sunday and was scheduled to be released today, she said.

The only apparent health problem Carter encountered during his term of office was in December 1978, when he was forced to cancel some of his White House appointments because of hemorrhoids.

His last public appearance was Saturday night, when he delivered the keynote address at a testimonial dinner in Atlanta for Mayor Andrew Young during observances of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. week.

There was no indication at that time that he planned to enter the hospital, but a longtime family friend said "apparently he sat too long Saturday night."

Carter kept fit during his term by jogging and playing tennis. In the summer, spring and fall he played tennis every day, often with presidential aide Hamilton Jordan or White House physician Dr. William Lukash.

Carter wrote his memoirs, "Keeping Faith," after leaving office and joined the Emory University faculty as a visiting professor of government and international studies.

Carter has made very few political appearances since leaving office.

Evicted tenants win big

United Press International
LUBBOCK — Barbara Rivera says she intends to carefully use a Publishers Clearinghouse Sweepstakes prize that gave her life a $50,000 turn from rags to riches at a crucial time.

Rivera, 36, and her three children were evicted last month for not paying the rent. She is pregnant and has been unable to work because her oldest daughter, 11-year-old Michelle, has leukemia.

"Can you imagine what $50,000 is going to mean to us, even if Uncle Sam takes half," she said Tuesday. "I've never had that much money in my life."

"I want to be wise with the money," she said. "I don't want to be broke again."

Rivera and her family had moved in with her estranged husband's brother and sister-in-law. She said she wanted to use some of the money to buy a home so her girls would not have to change schools again.

The girls changed schools three in a year because of evictions, she said.

"I want to get a freezer and I want to stock it full of food and I want to buy all the canned goods I want," she said. "I don't want to go to the refrigerator anymore and wonder what I will fix the girls to eat."
