Local cold air hurts crops

United Press International
Another blast of cold air winged its way through Texas at midweek, bringing snow and freezing rain to northern sections and once again making life miserable for farmers and ranchers concerned with livestock care and feeding.

The frigid weather, although less severe than the late December cold wave, kept the pressure on livestock feeding, said the Texas Agricultural Extension Service, Texas A&M University System.

Supplemental feeding has been heavy since the December deep freeze wiped out all grazing on small grains and winter pastures.

The heavy feeding is straining hay supplies and pushing up feed bills, noted the Extension Service. Hay prices are skyrocketing in some areas as supplies decline. Some ranchers in western areas are burning spines off prickly pear to allow livestock to forage on them.

Livestock conditions over the state have declined in recent weeks due to the lack of grazing and the adverse weather. Many animals have lost weight despite heavy feeding, and health problems are popping up in areas, the Extension Service said.

Some small grains, particularly wheat, have slowly started to recover from freeze damage suffered in late December. However, many fields were killed.

Harvesting of some winter vegetables is active in the Garden and Rio Grande Valley. Sugar cane harvesting as well as harvesting of citrus for juice continues in the Valley.

EDB

The National Cancer Institute and the EPA performed laboratory tests using rats and mice to determine EDB's carcinogenic properties in 1974.

"It is a national problem," Bernstein said, "but a 150-pound person would have to eat six to 12 tons of raw grain to equal the doses of EDB that gave those rats." Bernstein said the EPA limitations placed on the acceptable amounts of EDB in air as an example of the risk of cancer.

"EDB is used in leaded gasoline," he said, "and the EPA allows 20 parts per million much greater concentration in the air. And the workers shown no increase in cancer still not good stuff to be around."

"I'd be concerned if one son in the world got cancer after this."

EPA tests have shown that much as 80 percent of the pesticide is burned off when it is cooked. Whether EDB is a different compound when heated or becomes more dangerous is not known.

Tani Adams, director of pesticide research and extension project, disagreed with Bernstein. "Do you know the risk that one out of a thousand people could get cancer from this?" she asked.

"Some people would call it an epidemic," Adams said. "The no known level of acceptable exposure and that Bernstein misinformed."

"He just doesn't understand modern toxicology," she said. "In reference to Bernstein's assumption, she said, 'The extrapolation is meaningless. The important thing about EDB tests is that cancer tumors appeared at low doses.'"

Dr. Wendell Horne, an agricultural pathologist, explained EDB is one of the most effective fumigants for use against nematodes that damage peanuts and cotton. He said the more acutely toxic nematocides are now used. These nematocides have a mediate toxic effect if they are also more expensive than the fumigant types.
