Autry requesting release due to 'cruel' treatment

United Press International

BEAUMONT — Condemned killer James David Autry Thursday testified his close call with injection execution last October so unnerved him that he was unable to strike a match to light a cigarette. "I thought I was going to die," Autry said.

His lawyer, Stefan Presser, claimed that strapping Autry to a gurney in the Huntsville Unit's Death House Oct. 4 and injecting a needle in each arm one hour before he could legally be executed was cruel and unusual punishment, and a violation of the U.S. constitution.

At that time, a U.S. Supreme Court judge stayed Autry's execution at 11:30 p.m. — 30 minutes before he could be executed.

Texas Department of Corrections acting director Jack Pursley Thursday denied Autry suffered harsh treatment. "I don't believe he did," Pursley said.

But Presser, of the American Civil Liberties Union, pressed the usually untalkative Autry, his thoughts in the moment after he was let off a gurney.

Presser claimed in his appeal of Autry's sentence to the experience caused the state to lose its right to execute him.

Since the near execution, the state board overseeing prison has recommended the procedure leading to injection not begin until the hour that a prisoner can be executed.

U.S. District Judge Robert Parker gave no indication whether he might rule. He orders Presser to file his remaining legal briefs within two weeks, that time, he said, the state respond.
