Fine candy for sale

United Press International
A St. Louis candy shop has just the thing for this Valentine's day — a $250 box of chocolates.
"People are actually buying them," said Bud Kolbrener, who was 23 when he bought the turn-of-the-century candy firm of Karl Bissinger French Confections a decade ago.
The company was suffering along with other small businesses during the recession of the 1970s. Kolbrener steered it into safer financial waters by placing snob-appeal ads in ritzy publications.
The company's specialties include fresh raspberries hand-dipped in chocolate — shipped overnight and sold only in July — and Valentine's Day jigsaw puzzles of white and dark chocolates.

Not all the company's products require a bank withdrawal. Molasses lollies are among the most popular items, at 35 cents in the store or $12.50 a dozen by mail order.

The company's four-color catalog, sent to about 250,000 regular customers six times a year, touts its 8-pound extravaganza for $250 as the gift sure to impress.

"Be the one everyone mentions for your generosity," says the ad.

Other offerings include chocolate truffles at $40 a pound, a 30-piece set of white chocolate dominoes for $20 and a box of 11 Oreo cookies, each covered in chocolate and topped with a candy heart, for a mere $10.50.
"This is fun," Kolbrener said, "but you should see the beautiful things we come up with for Easter."

Not all the company's products require a bank withdrawal. Molasses lollies are among the most popular items, at 35 cents in the store or $12.50 a dozen by mail order.

The most luxurious delicacies are "langtrys," available only by special order because they keep only 12 hours. The delicacy is a French marshmallow dipped first in fondant and then in chocolate. Company founder Karl Bissinger named the confection for British stage beauty Lily Langtry, who died in 1929 at age 76.

The company name goes back some 300 years to Paris, where Kolbrener said the family has died out. Karl Bissinger set up shop in St. Louis in the 1880s and died without heirs in 1946 after selling the firm for $1 to five veteran employees.

Inflation in the 1970s, including a sudden rise in sugar costs, rocked all small candy manufacturers.

The employee-owners sold out to Kolbrener, who then was making hockey puck banks for the National Hockey League.

Kolbrener wooed customers outside St. Louis with magazine ads and a mouth-watering catalog he said has won design awards. He opened two other stores in the area and is debating expansion to other cities.

And he raised the prices.
"Either we charge a higher price or we discontinue the product," Kolbrener said. "It's all fresh ingredients. That's one of the reasons we charge more."

He insists on real cream, eggs and butter, and goes on overseas buying trips for ingredients.

Kolbrener expects business to continue improving. While people have become more health conscious, he said, they also have developed a taste for the niceties of life, like fine chocolate.

"Actually chocolate's good for you," he said. "It's very high in minerals and vitamins. Most people don't eat it in good amounts."

"I'm giving you egg whites, nuts and fruits — all the things you're supposed to eat."
