Braniff one step closer to returning

United Press International

WASHINGTON — The Civil Aeronautics Board said Thursday Braniff Inc. is fit to fly, a decision the newly reorganized carrier's attorney called a "very big and very happy step" toward its scheduled March 1 return to the skies.

The five-member CAB issued a memorandum saying it had declined to review Administrative Law Judge John Vittone's decision approving Braniff's fitness application.

The decision allows the transfer of a fitness certificate from bankrupt Dallas-based Braniff Airways Inc. to Braniff Inc., owned by the Chicago-based Hyatt Air Corp. under a firm known as Dalfort Corp.

"This was a very big and very happy step for us," said Tom McGrew, Braniff's Washington attorney. "If it hadn't been handled as expeditiously, it could have held up our plans to fly by March 1."

The CAB fitness review certified that the new airline is economically fit to operate.

McGrew said the airline now needs only to receive a Federal Aviation Administration operating certificate approving Braniff's equipment and FAA approval of proposed operating specifications.

"Everyone I've talked to is confident that can be done to get in the air by March 1," said McGrew.

He praised both federal agencies for moving so quickly on Braniff's application to fly.

The CAB acted within 65 days on the fitness application when the usual amount of time needed is six months.

Braniff International filed for bankruptcy in May 1982 and has been struggling since then to become airborne again.

Vittone ruled Tuesday that Braniff is fit to engage in interstate and overseas air transportation of passengers, cargo and mail but the ruling was not publicly announced because it is considered an initial decision.

Vittone said Braniff can fly to all points in the United States, its territories and possessions.

Vittone issued the decision without holding the usual oral arguments after granting confidential status to some of the items Braniff presented.
