NEW YORK — Hamburgers are being challenged by a crusty, disc-shaped delight that was almost unknown in the United States until the end of World War II.
A recent study shows pizza sales in restaurants have grown 155 percent in the past five years alone, and pizza restaurants now outnumber hamburger eateries in the United States.

the spring 1983 Re-Count, researched and published by the Restaurant Consulting Group Inc., Kenilworth, Ill.
"Pizza is being recognized as suitable for a meal rather than a snack and is making a quantum leap into full-service dining," says Aaron Spencer, developer of a nationwide chain of full-scale, upscale restaurants called Pizzeria Uno.
Trendy toppings featured by restaurants and pizzerias have included seafood, steak and cheese, and pizza skins — potato-flavored pizza wedges served with onions, cheddar cheese, bacon and sour cream.
The marketing vice president of a leading pizza chain thinks the nature of the food is responsible for its growing popularity.

"Eating pizza is a social and sharing occasion. It's fun and more than just a fueling occasion," says Ted Murphy of Nebraska-based Godfather's Pizza in the magazine article.
Pizza's popularity peaks in the Middle Atlantic, New England and East North Central states, where Italian immigrants and their families first opened small neighborhood pizzerias, staff writer Jacquie White Kochak says in the magazine report.
It is least popular in the western Sunbelt states and the Far West.

Pizzerias began to open throughout the United States in the late 1940s. Many early customers were GI veterans who first tasted the savory pies as they fought their way northward in Italy during World War II.
Chicago, another major pizza center today, is known for the deep dish type, just now starting to show up in other areas.
The dish's position as a dinner item is changing, Kochak says, as some chains promote either individual pizzas or pizzas by the slice for lunch.
One chain boosted its lunch sales by introducing three new products.

Snowstorm blankets West Texas

United Press International
Poor visibility from gusting wind and snow, plus slippery pavements, combined to cause an accident that killed a 35-year-old El Paso woman and injured four others Monday as snow covered most of West Texas.

Dead is Maria de la Luz Barriento Valtierra. Injured were Regina Sotomayor, 31, Yolanda Flores, 20, Raquel Villalobos, 27, and Mona Lopez, 29, all of El Paso.

Winter storm warnings were posted by the NWS for most of West Texas. Snow fell throughout the area, accompanied by freezing temperatures and high winds.

New Mexico State Police blamed wind and snow for an accident Monday in La Mesa, N.M., 25 miles north of El Paso. The winds knocked over an empty school bus, injuring the driver.

Mrs. Margaret Roybal was just beginning her rounds to pick up children when the accident occurred, police said.
In addition to the usual number of fender benders reported by police, heaviest damage was done to budding trees. Agricultural workers said temperatures were in the 70s and spring like on Sunday.

There was little improvement in the Texas weather scene by mid day as a blanket of clouds and a variety of precipitation was observed across the state.

Snow was falling across the Trans Pecos and northern Edwards Plateau, while showers and patchy light rain mixed with some snow scattered south of Dallas.

Elsewhere, heavy rain showers were scattered across the east and parts of south central Texas, while light rain dampened the gulf coastal waters.

Life expectancy up
United Press International
WASHINGTON — By the year 2000 life expectancy for women in the United States will have risen to 86.2 years, says a new life insurance newsletter.
An article in The Family Economics says the average life span for men by that date is expected to be 74.3 years. The figures were provided by gerontologist Elizabeth Crimmins, an assistant professor at the University of Southern California.
