Now to the real meat — where the jobs for the '80s will be.

Accounting is a fast growing job field. More and more pressure is being applied to businesses to prove their accounting procedures. While there may be some competition for jobs, the best place to find them is in large cities. The projected growth this field is 25 percent, and starting salary is $12,000.

Actuaries. Who are they you ask. They are the people who figure the odds for insurance companies, so if you hate math, count this one out.

Forty percent of all actuary work is done in New York, Hartford, Chicago, Philadelphia or Boston. Starting salary is $13,000, and the growth should be 35 percent.

Marketing and sales doesn't have such a promising look in the area of job growth — only 15 percent is predicted. Most of the job turnover in this area will be from people dying, retiring or finding a new career.

Many other areas of business, such as bank officer, require post graduate work.

Engineering has been, and will continue to provide plenty of jobs. It's one field where being a recent graduate is helpful, because you're familiar with the new technology. Though some areas like petroleum and chemical are experiencing a slump, it's still a good degree to have.

Safety engineering has a projected growth of only 15 percent, but starting salary is $20,000.

In agriculture engineering there is modest competition for jobs, but the surge in American dieting fads, health awareness and concern for world hunger may increase the demand for this career.

Ag engineers are responsible for creating a lower calorie, less expensive potatoe chip. Starting salaries are $22,000, but the best news is a job can be found almost anywhere.

If your field was not included, or if you're a liberal arts student considering a major change, more information can be found from the following places: Occupation Outlook Report, which is put out by the U.S. Dept. of Labor, 90 Most Promising Careers for the 80s, by Anita Gates and Careers Tomorrow, By Gene R. Hawes. These books are available at the Placement Center.

semester, but recalls the frustration of work and classes last semester.

"You have to make free time because you have none," Gilbrech says. "All the spare time I had, I spent working. It gets very frustrating. When you get off, all you can think about is resting from all the pressure."

Gilbrech says the pressure begins when the student has to work to pay for tuition, then increases throughout the semester when the student tries to keep the grades up.

Asked if the job takes away from the "college life," most of the working students say no. They says it not only enhances their social life (in meeting more students), but it also gives them good work experience.

"It was the best job I ever had," says Lori McNeill, a senior education major. McNeill is student teaching this semester, but worked as a cashier in the MSC bookstore last semester.

"I'm glad I did it," she says. "I forced myself to budget my time, and it was worth the sacrifices. I recommend working for anyone who needs to get their life in order."

nies in which her father had contacts with. After that she decided that she would rather stay in the College Station area, than work in Dallas.

She went to banks in the area and eventually found an accounting job at Brazos Bank, she says.

Though Scott didn't find her job through the placement center, she encourages students to use it.

"My sister did get her job through the center, and she also is an accounting major," she says. "It's a good opportunity. Though some majors, like horticulture, may not have many companies looking for them, the companies there are obviously looking for someone just out of college."
