Military slang entrenched in day-to-day conversation and his late father, who joined the cavalry in 1904. Lacey E. Hailey collected slang as he rode with General John "Blackjack" Pershing along the Mexican border and later during World War I, before he retired as a major.

Frank Hailey continued where his father left off, listening to how fighting men spoke in World War II, Korea and the early years of Vietnam.

Some phrases such as "R and B" for "rest and recreation" or "B and B" as in "booze and broads" seem permanently en-trenched in civilian language. Others, such as "Maggies drewers" an old term having in as for battle cas additional pintage for battle cas ualties? Or that "jarhead" was a cavalry term for a half-broken mule? said. With his book, Hailey said families could finally under-stand the meanings of "bottled sunshine" (beer), "dead soldier" According to Hailey, no sol-dier likes to talk openly of death, but invents phrases such as "He's gone West" or "bought (an empty liquor bottle or keg), "fishbait patrol" (crossing a river under heavy enemy fire) and "50 mission crush" (the way young pilots crushed their visored-cap sideways, as if head-phones had been slung over them for 50 combat missions). Hailey said he left out crus-tier expressions used by soldiers so that "a nun could read it and not blush. If I put everything in 'Soldier Talk' that should be there, it would have to be printed on asbestos paper."

The phrase, "you've had it," is heard everywhere, but how many people know it came from the British phrase for battle cas-
