Toxics thrown in Gulf

United Press International

GALVESTON - Workers wearing protective clothing and breathing gear tossed thousands of bottles of a toxic chemical into the Gulf of Mexico Monday rather than risk a second fatal explosion of the chemical in a populated area.

The chemical, aluminum phosphide, exploded July 27 and killed one dockworker as crews were unloading huge containers of the substance from an Argentine freighter docked at the Port of Houston. The chemical is highly volatile and emits toxic fumes upon contact

Some of the remaining 7,000 3-pound flasks of the chemical aboard the ship continued to leak, posing a hazard to the Houston Ship Channel, and the Coast Guard won permission from the Environmental Protection Agency to dump the remaining chemical in the gulf.

Roger Meacham, spokesman for the EPA regional office in Dallas, said crews began dumping 7,000 flasks of the chemical at an old hazardous dump site in the Gulf of Mexico 110 miles southeast of Galveston.

Workers, wearing special clothing and breathing apparatus to protect themselves from any toxic fumes emitted by the chemical, were tossing flasks of aluminum phosphide into the water one at a time and monitoring them until they sank.

The dumping was temporarily halted Sunday when some of the canisters being dumped floated to the surface and began to leak a small amount of gas, said Coast Guard Chief Petty Officer Stewart Alexan-

He said no one was injured, but the ship left the dumping area for a short while until the fumes dissi-By Monday, Meacham said the crews were puncturing each cannister to make sure they sink. "They are unscrewing, or removing the caps on the cannisters, dumping the pellets on the water and then puncturing each cannister so that it will take on water and sink rapidly," Meacham said.
