T-shirts

Western products hot with Soviet youth

United Press International

MOSCOW — Soviet young people are being subverted by Western T-shirts bearing slogans like "free love," pictures of rock idols and stars and stripes, an official journal said Sunday.

The T-shirts, like other hard-to-obtain foreign products, are hot items on the black market.

The August edition of the "Young Communist" journal said young people do not understand that the T-shirts symbolize an individualist and decadent Western culture whose ideals are alien to communism.

By wearing the T-shirts they are blaspheming the Soviet state and disdaining the motherland, it said.

The T-shirts are only one aspect of a campaign to undermine young people's "confidence in the correctness of the ideas and causes of communism," the article said.

"We are dealing with attempts to organize against us a real information propaganda intervention" whose main aim is "to create some kind of anti-socialist opposition."

The article proposed a counter campaign "to instill in every Soviet person a feeling of vigilance towards spies and diversionists."

The journal said rock music, films and literature are other mediums through which the West tries to alienate Soviet youth.

Teen idol Michael Jackson has been singled out as an example of bland, commercial music that mesmerizes people and prevents them from thinking about important political subjects like racial violence.

The article said video films being smuggled into the country, which pornography is intertwined with praise for the bourgeois way of life. And there is no need to report that this is aimed primarily at young people.

Even many Western movies pass the censor "cannot fail to have negative influence on young people," it said. Recent Western films shown in Soviet cinemas have included "Kramer versus Kramer" and "Tootsie," both starring American actor Dustin Hoffman.
