Health service abuse exposed

United Press International
SAN ANTONIO — Health care organizations with a large number of physicians on their boards, such as Blue Cross and Blue Shield, are characterized by lax fraud enforcement and high pay for doctors, a sociologist said Tuesday.

Paul Jesilow, John Espar and Henry Pontell disclosed the results of a lengthy study on fraud and abuse in health care institutions. Their study was part of a wider investigation funded by the Justice Department.

"They (doctors and hospital administrators) may be screwing the programs," Jesilow said. "What they are doing is sending bills for services they never render or sending bills for services that are not needed. The estimates indicate that 10 to 25 percent of a program's cost (such as Blue Cross or Medicaid) is lost to fraud or abuse."

Jesilow and Pontell released their study Monday during the 79th annual meeting of the American Sociological Association, comprised of about 12,000 professional sociologists, both in academics and in applied fields. Espar was unable to attend the meeting of about 230 ASA members.

"A great deal of white collar crime exists in the health-care field, yet remains undisclosed because of extremely lax enforcement efforts," the report said.

"The way that enforcement of white-collar crime in the medical field has developed and is currently organized has been greatly influenced by medical organizations and individual physicians."

"Where physicians' representation on the boards of organizations such as Blue Cross and Blue Shield, relatively high, fraud and abuse enforcement ... are minimal and reimbursement rates to health care providers are relatively high, according to the report."

Jesilow said, "The doctors defend themselves with the claim that they have to order an unusual high number of costly diagnostic tests to protect themselves from

Family is arrested for sexual assault

United Press International
HOUSTON — The neighbors of a family accused of sexually assaulting and holding a 13-year-old girl against her will for nearly a week cheered when police took them away, a sheriff's detective said Tuesday.

Robert Lee Watts, 18, his father, Hayward Watts, 52, and his mother, Gloria Watts, 46, were being held in lieu of $10,000 bond each Tuesday following their arrests Monday, Sgt. George Sturgis said.

An older son, Jerry Wayne Watts, remained at large, he said.

"I know they're not rich," Sturgis said of the family. "From the reaction of the neighborhood, I don't think any of their neighbors will post bond (for them). Detective (Marcel) Dionne said the neighbors cheered when they were arrested and taken away. I don't think they were liked very well."

Sturgis said although the girl voluntarily left her home last Monday with Robert Watts, "after she got there, she wanted to leave. She was kept there against her will."

The girl apparently was drugged with Mandrax, a barbiturate obtained in Mexico, and appeared in a confused state when she was found at the Watts' home, Sgt. Joe Seckler said.

"She was not beaten or tied down, but she had been given enough Mandrax — at least three tablets in one day — that she wouldn't have to be tied down for her to stay there," Seckler said.

The two brothers are charged with aggravated kidnapping and aggravated sexual assault. The parents are charged with aggravated kidnapping "with the intent to facilitate aggravated sexual assault" of the young girl.

They will not be charged with possession of illegal drugs because such a charge would be minor in comparison to the other charges, Sturgis said.

"She (the girl) said the mother also knew they were having sex because one time she (the mother) walked in on them," Detective Talton said.

The girl remained under observation at an area hospital Tuesday and was expected to be released Wednesday, he said.

She was found in the Watts' home early Monday after investigators received an anonymous call from a man saying the girl was voluntarily staying with him.

Dionne said an investigator recognized the taped voice as that of Robert Watts. The investigator had arrested Watts two years ago as a juvenile, when he was accused of kidnapping and sexually abusing a young boy.

The girl's father reported he missed last Tuesday after he determined she was not staying with friend.

Right-to-work issue heats up Senate race

United Press International
AUSTIN — Republican Senate candidate Phil Gramm fanned the fires of a controversy Tuesday over his Democratic opponent's position on the right-to-work issue, saying Lloyd Doggett tried to mislead voters.

Gramm told a news conference that Doggett misrepresented his views on the issue during an address last week in Austin to the Texas Association of Counties.

Doggett told the convention he had never voted against Texas right-to-work law, which stipulates that a worker can hold a job without joining a labor union.

But Gramm said he called on Doggett to send a letter to the association to "set the record straight concerning his (Doggett's) voting record on right-to-work guarantees for Texas workers."

Gramm's news conference followed by one day a news conference by Hilary Doran of Del Rio, a former legislator and aide to ex-Gov. William P. Clements. Doran and Gramm cited five instances in which they said Doggett effectively opposed right-to-work issues.

"It is increasingly clear that while I'm running on my record, my opponent is running from his record," said Gramm, a GOP congressman who left the Democratic Party 18 months ago.

Doran used records from the 1974 Texas constitutional convention, at which both Doran and Doggett were delegates, to show Doggett cast three votes against right-to-work proposals put forth during the convention.

And Gramm Tuesday revealed two votes by Doggett in the Texas Senate in 1975 and 1981 in which Doggett opposed a provision to write right-to-work laws into the state Constitution and a bill prohibiting "agency shops."

"I think it's very clear that the voting record my opponent has compiled, as rated by the AFL-CIO in the state, he's been a friend of organized labor," said Gramm. "There's nothing wrong with that, but the point I'm raising ... is that now he's running for the U.S. Senate trying to run away from that record."

But during an appearance in Houston, Doggett said Tuesday once he did the right-to-work issue come before him as a piece of legislation, and he voted (in 1977) to support an amendment to the Hartley Act that permitted states to have right-to-work laws.

"I did oppose (the legislation) including the issue of right to work in the Texas Constitution," he said, "but I don't believe it is a constitutional issue. But when it appeared the Constitution might go down, I supported it. I did not think it was an enough issue to warrant killing the Constitution."

"I will not back off my record. I'm quite proud of it."

The Austin state senator said Gramm was continuing with a campaign of conservative versus liberal while Doggett said he preferred to look for solutions to problems on both sides.

He called Gramm a loner and an extremist, who "looks first for cameras instead of how to get the job done."

Doggett noted in a survey conducted by National Journal, a magazine that rated congressmen on the basis of their support of conservative issues in 1983, Gramm ranked 53rd of 535.

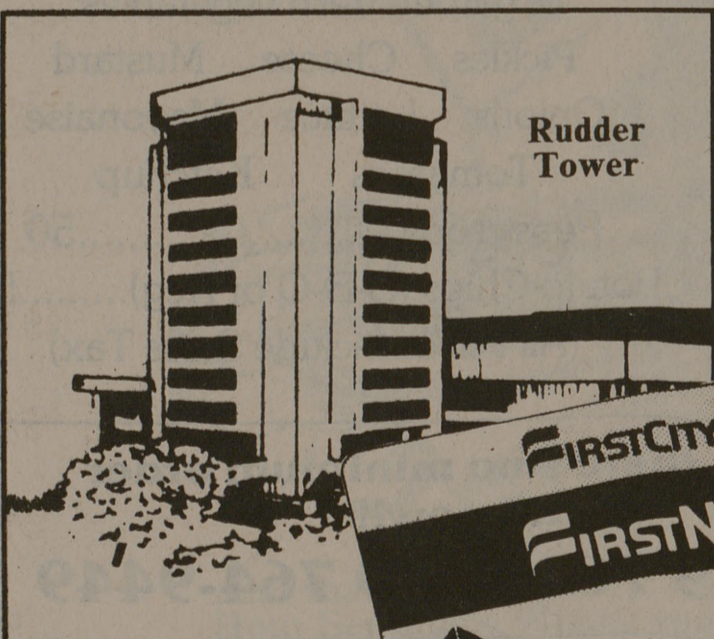

"From his perspective, (North Carolina GOP Sen. Jesse Helms looks a little to the left," Doggett added.
