Volleyball coach officiates during summer Olympics

By MARK SPICER
Reporter

A Texas A&M physical education coordinator for team sports joined the ranks of an elite group of people this summer. He was an Olympic volleyball official.

Noel Orr came to Texas A&M in 1975 as a volleyball and archery specialist. He was a YMCA physical education and youth education director for three years in San Antonio, where he "actually started getting involved with volleyball," Orr said.

"The YMCA director of the whole city of San Antonio happened to be the United States Volleyball Association president at that time. And so we ran volleyball leagues at the Y (YMCA) and had noon-time classes and early morning classes," Orr said.

Orr's involvement in coaching and officiating volleyball began in San Antonio. When he moved to Amarillo he coached teams which were Class A regional champions in the men's division.

"After two years there I went back to San Antonio and went into public school teaching," he said. "After that I was at Southwest Texas State University for two years and in 1975 I came here."

The selective process of officials for the Olympics or other international competition in volleyball is somewhat formal.

"First off, everybody has to be a certified official and each nation recommends certain players or officials that can go to an international officials clinic and become certified," Orr said. "Along with that clinic, they have to do a certain number of matches that are approved."

Other qualifications to become an international official include having attended the clinic before reaching age 40 and having been a national referee for a minimum of five years before applying for it.

"Normally you officiate home matches," he said. "People are coming into this country with teams and they're playing against our national team. In that case if they go on tour you may get to go with them for a week or two and have five or six matches you get to officiate. Or they may be coming through your city and playing a match and they call you a local referee that's qualified, so you go and officiate that particular match.

"After you've got that much background then the first thing you know the continental championships or some other major tournaments come up and your name is recommended by our national association."

In some cases it comes down to who is available.

"We have 13 international officials in the United States and out of that 13 they're not all available on the same week," Orr said. "We only have two teams, so that means that one team travels quite a lot and we kind of work in shifts whenever we are available."

"My time usually comes in the summer, so I was fortunate in the fact that most of the bigger games, matches and things are held in the summertime, but not necessarily all of them. Tours and a lot of tournaments are held up into November quite frequently and I miss out on a lot of those."

Orr said he did not really expect to officiate any of the matches in the Olympics because he was not chosen as one of the two primary U.S. officials. He had been chosen as one of four extras. The extras were there as stand-ins in case someone got sick, hurt, injured or couldn't make a match, he said.

But each of the four extra officials got to officiate a match.

"The match I had was Tunisia and Egypt which was for ninth place," Orr said.

The United States Volleyball Association and the Los Angeles Olympic Committee paid for his travel expenses, provided him with accommodations at the Hyatt Regency and gave him $40 a day for meals. He also received several sets of different uniforms from various major companies who were sponsoring the games.

Orr is currently the faculty-sponsor for the collegiate volleyball club team at Texas A&M. He said they usually have two teams that play but for the last two years they have only had one.

"We're ... opening it up for those people interested in being in that club," he said.

Plane lands upside down, kills 2 passengers on board

United Press International

QUINLAN — A single-engine plane crashed Sunday during a landing attempt at a private airstrip northeast of Dallas, killing both people on board, state officials said.

Charles Edward Holloway, 51, was attempting to land his single-engine Cessna Skyhawk 172 at an air-trip on his Hunt County ranch shortly before 10 a.m. when he hit a power line and flipped over, state officials said.

The plane landed upside down, killing both Holloway and the only other person aboard, Terry Lee Bishop, 25, said a dispatcher for the Texas Department of Public Safety.

Business fellowship for aggressive student

By JULIE BAILEY
Reporter

Business students with high potential and a competitive nature may be interested in a new management program here.

The Undergraduate Fellows program, organized through the College of Business Administration, is unique to Texas A&M, says Vickie Lacy, associate coordinator of the program.

Applications for 1985-86 Fellows will be accepted in 323 Blocker through Oct. 5.

Students are selected for the program during the spring semester of their junior year. The students' senior year consists of a rigorous program of seminars, conferences, and a business simulation exercise.

The core of the program, though, is a summer internship between the students' junior and senior years, for which the students can gain six to nine hours credit for the 18 month program. The selection process is based on grades. It is based on management potential, leadership motivation, and competitiveness says.

"Through research, we've found that one in 10 people has management potential," Lacy says. "We try to find the one and the skills they already have."

Marianne Dominguez, a management major in the program, says she got the most out of the program people need to be competitive, aggressive, competitive, and personable but mainly have the drive to succeed.

David Watts, a senior financial major, says the Fellows program is consuming.

"You have to dedicate yourself but it's worth every second," said.
