Esten

know as much as I do about theater," Esten said.

Esten shared his knowledge of theater with drama students at A&M for 24 years.

"I tried to pick the best plays from each country and introduce the students to them. That way I could show them the drama of each country. Of course, when a kid comes from Muleshoe — he may not be too interested in Dostoevsky," he said.

"My point always was — if you're gonna spend eight weeks with that age group of intelligent people they need to have learned something of value rather than some skimpy production.

"There were lots of other playwrights from Shakespeare's day, but you never hear about those guys — they stink.

"Only dummies like me who've read the stuff know about them," he said.

Esten smiled as he recalled a particular rendition of Macbeth:

"We worked on it for six months and tried to do something that hadn't been done before. The three witches in that play are usually portrayed as ugly old hags; well, I took three nice looking bimbos, scantily clad and used them as sex symbols.

"I think that's what Shakespeare meant it to be. Those characters produced the downfall of the other characters. I took a lot of flack for that one."

So Esten's reign was not without controversy:

"In The Tempest, I used a young girl to play the part of the fairy. A real fairy, not the kind they talk about these days. Anyway, one of my colleagues accosted me and said, 'Don't you know that the character Aerial is a boy?'

"I asked him, 'Didn't you know that fairies are sexless?' I used a little girl because she looked nice on the set. Those big fat boys didn't look too good in leotards," he said.

But Esten, the director, had a lot of respect for his students.

"Sometimes a student has a sense of when to come and where to go better than any director can tell them," he said. "Although once I had a boy come onto the room on the set and go straight for the phone. I asked, 'how'd you know where the phone was? You've never been in this room before.'

"Just where has your character been anyway? I would always ask my students," he said. "If they didn't know, I figured they were very stupid characters or just very stupid."

Taking his other cat onto his lap and removing his tie from her claws he finished by saying, "There's been too much bad teaching. Theater is a learning process. We are concerned with what the actor does — not so much the mistakes he makes. So just do something.

"That really riles me — so do something — quick!"
