Zinc, nickle swap increases enzyme digestion activity

University News Service

Scientists from Texas A&M, Harvard Medical School and the University of Nebraska have discovered that copper and nickle substitutes for zinc in enzymes of marine bacteria increase the protein-digesting activity of the enzymes.

Researchers have long known that our bodies contain protein-digesting enzymes with zinc atoms at the most active part of the enzyme's molecule. These enzymes serve as biological catalysts to operate all the chemical systems necessary to sustain life.

Substituting copper and nickel for zinc in enzymes of marine bacteria increases the protein-digesting activity from six to 25 times, sometimes more.

No clear applications yet exist for such knowledge, which is justified to researchers because it adds to the knowledge of how and why enzymes work, said Texas A&M biochemist Dr. John M. Prescott, a widely recognized authority.

"Certainly, if there is a biomedical or clinical application for these findings, it would be widespread because such metalloenzymes are present in almost every tissue of the body — the brain, kidney, liver and others," said Prescott, director of the University's Institute of Occupational Medicine. He is midway through a three-year study supported by $280,000 from the National Institutes of Health.

The current research was prompted when Prescott spent a year at Harvard Medical School's Center for Biochemical and Biophysical Sciences and Medicine.

In studying the enzyme aminopeptidase from the marine bacteria Aeromonas proteolytica (literally, "protein splitter"), the scientists found that special chemical solutions used to remove zinc from the enzyme completely inactivated the aminopeptidase's ability to digest proteins.

At present, other researchers at the University of Alberta are trying to crystallize the molecules of the bacterial enzyme and perform three-dimensional studies of its structure, said Prescott — who with Dr. Stella Wilkes first isolated the aminopeptidase 18 years ago at his A&M laboratory.

Atari looking for mix of business, creativity

United Press International

NEW YORK — There are creative people and there are business people. The problem is getting both of them in the same company, says Scott Cohen, who wrote a book chronicling the history of Atari.

If there is a moral to the Atari story, it may be that neither creativity nor business pragmatism is enough to keep a growing company healthy, Cohen said.

"You can only be creative in developing a product, and straight-business in selling it," he said. "You have to have that balance, and Atari never had it."

When Cohen began his Atari story, it was intended to be a success story about the electronic games company that made it. But Cohen missed his deadline on the book, "Zap — The Rise and Fall of Atari," and during the intervening weeks Atari began its sudden descent into an ocean of red ink.

Atari was founded in 1972 by Nolan Bushnell, a young engineer with $500, and an interest in computer games. Its first major product, Pong, was a huge success.

"Atari did as well as could be expected, being run by people who didn't know how to run a company," Cohen said in a recent interview.

When Warner Communications purchased Atari, the people who took over management of Atari "were selling something they essentially knew nothing about," Cohen said.

The influx of corporate salesmen made life uncomfortable for the original engineers, "guys who were undisciplined, didn't like punching a time clock," Cohen said. "Atari started losing its creative people."

Atari recently was purchased by Jack Tramiel, a hard-driving entrepreneur who founded Commodore, Atari's chief rival, but resigned from the company in a dispute last January.
