Astronauts had great flight, crew overcomes problems

United Press International

SPACE CENTER, Houston — The five men and two women, who spent a crowded eight days in orbit aboard the shuttle Challenger, said Thursday their flight demonstrated the value of having people in orbit to handle unexpected problems. "We had what I consider a fantastic flight," commander Robert Crippen, a veteran of four shuttle flights, said at a news conference.

"It had its little bumps, but I think if it did anything it underscored that having people involved can make the difference between a failure and a success." Crippen, pilot Jon McBride, and crew members Sally Ride, Kathy Sullivan, David Leestma, Paul Scully-Power and Canadian Marc Garneau landed at the Kennedy Space Center Oct. 13 to wrap up a stunning Earth-study mission that was hampered throughout by a series of snags. A vital radio antenna went haywire, a NASA communications satellite was knocked out of action temporarily, and the crew had trouble with a 35-foot-long folding radar mapping antenna in the payload bay.

But the shuttle fliers handled those problems and others in stride and brought home a wealth of scientific data about Earth and its environment.

Scully-Power, an Australian-born U.S. Navy oceanographer, unveiled slides of the world's oceans that he said illustrated a "far more complex system than we ever expected."

One photo showed 8-mile-wide spiral eddies, or currents, in the Mediterranean Sea similar to those first discovered during a shuttle flight in 1981.

"What came out of this particular flight was that we were able to see that this sort of structure is interconnected for thousands of miles," Scully-Power said. "I think this is starting a whole new look at the dynamic situation in the oceans."

Crippen, who flew two earlier shuttle flights with crews of five, said Challenger's record seven-member crew pushed the limits of the shuttle's capabilities.

"It was crowded, but it was certainly doable," he said. "From standpoint of just operating in the orbiter, five is more comfortable than operating with seven."

Mission specialists David Leestma and Kathy Sullivan broke ground during a spacewalk by successfully demonstrating techniques that will be used to refuel satellites on future shuttle missions.

Sullivan, the first American woman to walk in space, said she would have liked more time to walk the earth go by.

Garneau, the first Canadian in space, also enjoyed the view from orbit. The electronics engineer conducted a series of experiments during the mission primarily involving life sciences and physics.

Debate

Gramm, who stared stonily at Doggett when the Democrat read the quotes that have appeared in television ads, outlined the difference between the candidates on economic issues as a simple one.

"I want to control spending. I want to raise taxes," Gramm said. Gramm claimed his economic package has created 7 million new jobs, 850,000 of those in Texas and provided a 25 percent tax cut. He billed himself as "the guy who helped save Social Security."

But Doggett accused Gramm of supporting a national sales tax. Doggett called "the Phil Gramm tax," which Doggett said included a flat income tax that would repeal the home mortgage deduction.

After that accusation, Gramm said, "Lloyd, you are shameless. Do not support a national income tax."

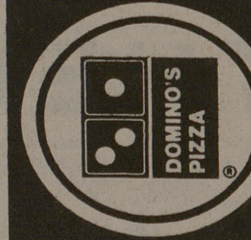

Gramm charged that Doggett was attacking him to divert attention from what he called one of the most liberal voting records in the Texas Senate.

"He's doing that because he's not run on his record," Gramm said, and he accused Doggett of changing his stance on issues since his primary and runoff battles.

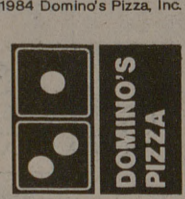

After Doggett cited his opposition to the Simpson-Mazzoli immigration bill, Gramm chastized him. "Lloyd, I'm afraid you've changed your tune again."
