Research

The University will receive almost $30 million in federal research funds from the National Science Foundation for the project every year for 10 years.

A&M's research park is not something that will develop overnight — or even over the course of a couple of years.

The first research park based as part of a university was at Stanford University in California.

The park was started in 1951 and, after more than 30 years, led to the development of the famed high-tech silicon valley, home of some of the country's largest computer firms.

Since then, 27 such parks have been started, most of them failures.

An Ohio State University study finished three years ago showed that six of the parks were successful, 16 were failures, and five were somewhere in between.

With these odds, A&M officials decided first to thoroughly research their idea.

"When A&M wanted to start their park, they came and looked at Utah's," Money said.

Money said the University administrators wanted to see how a successful park was planned, managed and developed.

The park is part of the University's Target 2000 plan.

Target 2000 is a long-term set of goals, set up for the University by the Board of Regents in 1981, that strives for A&M to reach world-university status by the turn of the century.

The plan's general report, released in May 1983, outlines some objectives on the University's research:

- Recommendations:
- The Board of Regents should develop a formal policy favoring increased ties between the private sector and should vigorously support efforts to make such linkages an operating reality.

- Efforts should be supported to attract high technology industries and businesses to the areas surrounding the system campuses.

- Offices and activities of the system should be established in research parks and in other appropriate locations throughout the state where linkages with the private sector can be facilitated.

Rationale:

- The system can benefit as much from the teaching, research and service capabilities of the private sector as the private sector can benefit from the teaching, research and service capabilities of the system.

- Lost federal dollars for research and other activities are not likely to be made up completely by the Legislature.

- There is reasonable compatibility between the objectives of the system and the objectives of private sector entities.

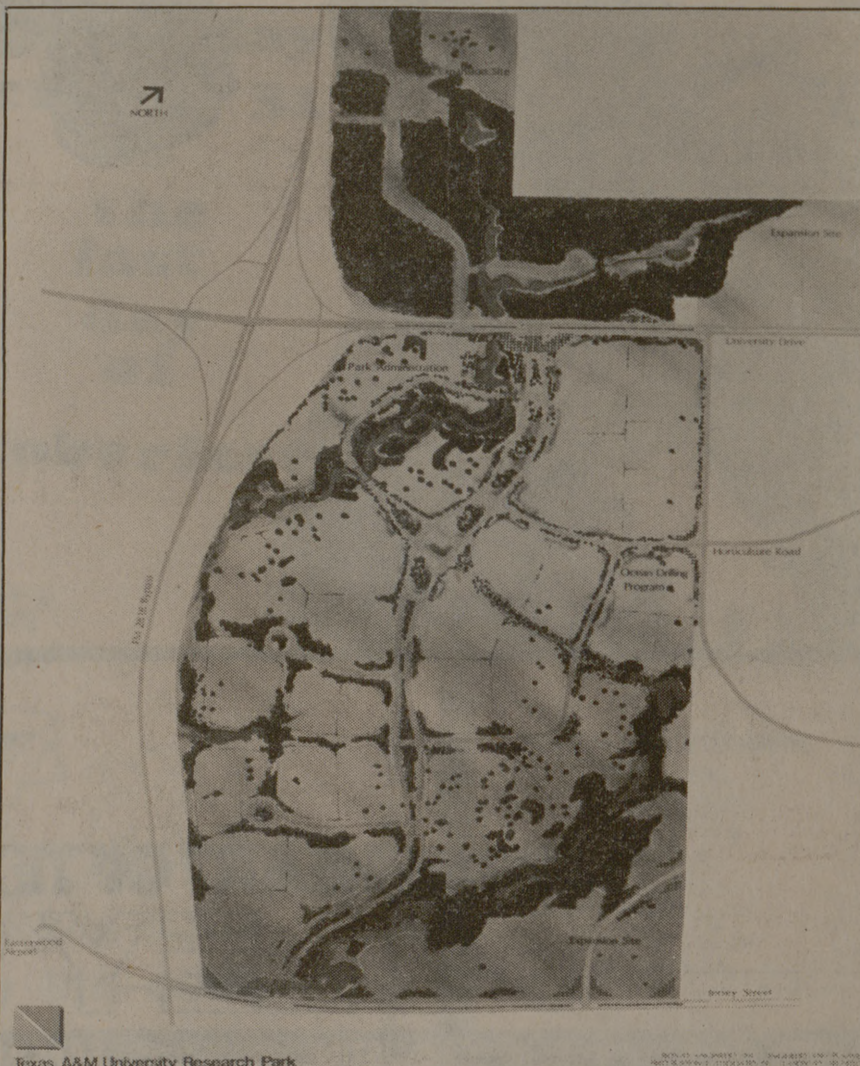

Money has described the research park as a symbiotic endeavor.

The business community can benefit by using the University's facilities and experts, and the University can benefit from, for one thing, the financial resources of the private industries.

A&M faculty can benefit by working with the companies as consultants. Students can benefit by doing work there while in school as well as being provided with post-graduate job opportunities.

The local community can benefit because of the employment opportunities that would open up with the arrival of private businesses — the research park in Utah employed more than 3,000 people.
