Minority precincts OK, watchers say

United Press International

HOUSTON — Fears of confrontations between Republican and Democratic poll watchers at minority precincts fizzled Tuesday, with volunteers from both parties reporting calm.

Sen. Craig Washington, D-Houston, said Sunday that he had arranged for "big, black and burly" men to prevent intimidation by Republican poll watchers on election day, but a spot check of minority precincts revealed none of his watchers.

"Senator Washington hasn't asked anybody to come over here," Mary Helen Kannady said in Houston's historic Fourth Ward. "We can take care of our own."

Kannady, a black woman who has been a Democratic Party worker for 28 years, said the Republican poll watchers at the Bible Way Baptist Church were just sitting there minding their business.

Henry Mora, a white Republican watching voters at a black elementary school east of downtown, said, "There's been a lot of rotten press about this." Mora carried an index card saying he was a poll watcher and was not allowed to talk to voters.

"I can only speak for myself," Mora said. "I have no intention of intimidating anybody and I wasn't asked to."

Mora said election judge Ernest B. McDonald was running a fair and impartial election, and he didn't expect to find anything different.

County Republican leaders and some women volunteers had met with concern after Washington said he had arranged for ex-combat poll watchers to watch the Republicans watch the polls.

But at a polling place at traditionally black Wheatley High School, Democratic poll watcher was a white woman, who pointed out she was not burly.

Judy Hatfield said she had been of Washington's statements, and attributed them to hot adverse opinion by both parties as the election drew near.

Hatfield said that both parties feared intimidation but there was none.

Her Republican counterpart, George Payne, joked that he was a sweet guy who wouldn't intimidate anybody.

State Republican Party Chairman George Strake, who said he had been shocked by Washington's announcement Sunday, said Tuesday the GOP had poll watchers in 19 percent of the 6,000 precincts in Texas.

"We have them in black, brown, white, every precinct in Texas where we could get a poll watcher," he said. "You know we know there have been votes stolen in Texas in the past half century. We're trying to do is insure an election."

Strike

Pickets arrested for blocking traffic during shift change

United Press International

WHITE SETTLEMENT — Police arrested at least five people outside a General Dynamics plant Tuesday following an altercation during a shift change as workers attempted to leave the plant through picket lines.

The incident occurred after negotiations had resumed earlier in the day between Local 776 of the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers and bargaining representatives of General Dynamics, producer of the Air Force's main single-engine fighter jet.

The arrests of five or six people came during a shift change when cars blocking the entry of the plant were preventing traffic from leaving, City Manager Bob Salinas said.

No violence was reported at the plant Tuesday, unlike the first day of the strike when outbreaks of violence led to the arrest of seven people and prompted police to throw tear gas into the crowd.

A television cameraman and a bicyclist trying to enter the plant Monday received minor injuries as chanting among union members escalated to bottle and rock throwing, officials said.

District Judge William Hughes set a hearing for 1 p.m. Wednesday after issuing an order prohibiting pickets from impeding the entry and exit of vehicles from the plant and injuring, threatening or destroying the property of anyone entering or leaving the plant.

Salinas said Hughes' restraining order might have had an effect on the crowd of 7,500 that gathered outside General Dynamics' gate.

Union members have said they would walkout will shut down production of the F-16 single-engine fighter. However, company spokesman Joe Thornton said production of F-16 and other programs has continued.

Salinas said the city has arranged for Fort Worth, Tarrant County Department of Public Safety officers to assist its 12-member police department if further trouble arises. General Dynamics, the largest employer in the area.
