GSS

help with funding problems.

"There have been times when the club was having trouble getting through," he says. "Particularly with this court case, we've used a lot of money.

"Plus, we have to pay for meeting rooms and things we would get free from the University if recognized. The ads in The Battalion cost us more than it does the recognized student organizations. It all adds up to several hundred dollars."

Roberts says, however, that the biggest problem for the GSS right now is not funds but getting new people to join. He says the battle for recognition has made more gays aware of the group, but has had negative effects as well.

"A lot of people have expressed to me that they don't like the fact that we're doing this and that they will think of joining us once we're through fighting," he says. "And after that, recognition might hurt us with membership because people might still be scared to join because of 'Will someone know that I'm a member of this group?'. Of course that's not going to happen, but those conceptions still exist."

Attitudes such as that are something that Roberts says the GSS constantly faces. That was apparent during the demonstration last Thursday when members of SWAMP threatened to sit on the Memorial Student Center grass. Many students assumed that the GSS was involved and anti-gay signs were highly visible in the crowd during the demonstration.

"SWAMP has no responsibility to us and they don't have to ask us for approval," Roberts says. "They are an independent organization and we have no common members.

"We knew some people would try to tie us to the demonstration — we're really not surprised. Some people believed it because that's what they were told, some believed it because they wanted to.

"I think a lot of people who are against us were happy to see us tied to a very unpopular issue. We were relatively doing better than we have been at other times, and unfortunately this incident and our being tied to it hurt us."

"We stand behind SWAMP's ideals. We may not agree with their particular methods however. On this particular issue we had no participation."

The GSS also faced added student reaction after the Student Senate passed a resolution favoring its recognition. After the resolution was passed, it was vetoed by Student Body President David Alders, because of what he called technical problems. Roberts says he was pleased with the Senate's actions, but not surprised at Alder's veto.

"The Senate voted in the public interest rather than the public view," he says. "And I knew ahead of time that the president of the student body was against us. As a matter of fact, he called us a social club. Again, I can assure you that he had no idea of what we're about — he has never come in contact with us.

"This may not look good for the Senate now, but in the long run it will. I think Diane Baumbach expressed that, citing that back in 1969, the student senate voted against letting women on campus.

"It's not a question of majority views, it's a question of what's right and wrong."

Many students have expressed disagreement with that last statement, saying that the senators should have voted as their constituents wished. Roberts says government involves more than taking polls and that the Senate acted accordingly.

"When I elect someone to represent me, I would hope that they act not on my ignorance but on the facts they have, that I may not have," he says. "The majority of the students don't have the facts because we are unable to provide them at this time. That's what we are trying to do."

Roberts says the fight for recognition has been tough, but is something he doesn't regret.

"Out of bad things, good things come," he says. "What A&M has accomplished by going up the legal ladder is that a precedent has been set. We will be helping out other student groups across the state.

"Maybe it wasn't worth it to the students a few years ago, and maybe the students now won't benefit either. But in the long run — and for the people that come after us — yes, it is worth it."
