Texts attacked at state hearing

United Press International

AUSTIN — Religious fundamentalists Thursday attacked science and biology textbooks proposed for Texas classrooms as being pro-evolution, favoring abortion and containing sex education-related illustrations that are too graphic.

"It's not sex education, it's more of a how to," Clova Wood of Garland said of one of the books during a public hearing before the state Board of Education.

Wood and Carolyn Galloway of Dallas were the most outspoken critics of the sex education portion of the proposed biology texts, which they said contained illustrations of the sex organs that are too detailed.

"I think it breaks down the natural barrier that exists between boys and girls," Galloway said. "I challenge you board members to go back to your districts and find out what's being taught in sex education."

The newly appointed 15-member board got its first exposure to Texas' textbook selection process at the public hearing on proposed new texts for science and biology for the next six years.

The panel will consider adoption of the $55.4 million in texts for the 1985 school year when it meets Saturday. The science and biology texts are for grades 1-5 and for college preparatory courses.

Another witness, Sherry Bell of Dallas, complained that one of the biology books "sounded wrong" on the issue of abortion because it seemed to advocate abortion as a means of birth control.

"The author must have a pro-abortion philosophy, which is strong," she said. "I'm sure millions of people around the state would be alarmed at this."

The assault on the books was led by nationally known textbook critic Mel Gabler of Longview, a religious fundamentalist who called on the board to reject the books because they give unfair emphasis to the theory of evolution.

"There is much solid scientific evidence against evolution, but this kind of scientific evidence is censored from the textbooks you are considering for adoption," he said. "This is intellectual dishonesty."

Steven Schafersman of Houston, president of the Texas Council for Science Education, also called on the board to reject the books, but on the basis that they contained "unscientific passages."

The texts won the lukewarm endorsement of anti-censorship leader Michael Hudson of Austin who said the books appeared to have been selected on "educational criteria."

Hudson, Texas coordinator of People for the American Way, said the books were "not ideal," but added it appeared the textbook committee, Board of Education and education commissioner had not "caved in to pressure to reject books or require textual changes based on political or religious ideology."
