Hyams

says. "And I drew Scheider, I drew Lithgow, I drew Balaban. So I had them in mind. I've talked to others who write and they agree that you pick an actor to picture and hear in your mind. You get fixated. Which could be horrible if you can't get them to do the movie."

Hyams' film is based on the novel by Arthur C. Clarke. When he wrote the screenplay, he says he counted on help from Clarke a great deal.

"We set up a computer link," he says, "and I dealt with him every single day. Because there were some fairly large changes in the story, I wanted him to be aware of what I was doing and I wanted us to discuss it."

"I think there is a responsibility you have if you adapt somebody else's work to realize their intent. So I would not write changes of any substance without talking to him. If there was something I wanted to do that he didn't like, I would try to find a compromise. I wouldn't go ahead and change it. I didn't think I had that right to take somebody else's story and change their intent."

Hyams sees his film as a vision.

It was a chance to make a film about peace," he says. "This is a very hopeful film. 2010 is a fascinating date in that it sounds very far away."

"But I'm 41 years old and I have a son who is 15. In the year 2010, he will be exactly my age. The teenagers who see this will be watching a film about their time. For that reason I think it is enormously relevant to that age group."
