Lizards model fashions

United Press International
PLANO — When Plano High School students staged a fashion show this week, the models looked a little green around the edges.

Five lizards and iguanas were the subject of a class project to design haute couture for the green-skinned set. Designs ranged from cowgirl and sailor outfits to a Michael Jackson look-alike, dressed in red and black leather jacket and pants.

Garbage Can Harry, a lizard, arrived in drag. He wore a flowered print bikini, a turquoise mesh cover-up, lei and sandals.

The fashion show was suggested by a California film producer who asked Dallas animal agent Chere Hickock to arrange a reptilian fashion show. The idea fell through, but Hickock mentioned it to Jim Dunlap, director of Plano High's Living Materials Center, which owns several lizards.

Plano teacher Lois Hollingsworth, who suggested the idea to her class, said her students' projects usually are conservative. "On something like this, they let their imaginations run wild," she said.

"This will be something to put on a resume," said student Dana Stearns. "How many people get to say they design for iguanas?"

Dunlap said the lizards weathered the experience well. "Fortunately for the reptilian world, they don't understand the concept of humiliation," he said.

Liberal

seven professors have published books this year.

"You would never have seen that in the 1960s at Texas A&M," he said. "That's a demonstration of all the action that's taking place in the College of Liberal Arts."

The small size of the departments in the College of Liberal Arts is considered an advantage by many students. Because the department is small, students and professors can get to know each other and a student can gain experience in his field that he might not get in a larger department.

"I've really been impressed with it (the psychology department)," Sharon Moffitt, a junior psychology major, said. "The classes are small enough to get to know your professor. I think there's a big advantage over a school with a much bigger department."

"I think the quality of the people is just as good here, from what I've heard. I don't feel I'm getting an inferior education just because it's a small department."

Senior anthropology major Robert Franciscus said that because the A&M anthropology department is small, undergraduates get hands-on experience with research projects that only graduate students would work on at a school with larger department.

Senior Jay Buzzini, a sociology major, said he benefits more from his teachers because of the more personalized interaction.

"The teachers are excellent," he said. "You're not just a number, as opposed to the business college or the engineering college."

Kim Treese, a junior journalism major, said, "I've been more pleased as time goes on. Compared to other schools, I think it (the journalism department) is much better. You get more on-the-job training."

Dr. Vaughn Bryant, head of the anthropology department, said more students are entering the liberal arts field because of a trend in education to return to basics and traditional fields found in liberal arts.

Schools across the country, such as the Universities of Tulsa, Idaho and Oregon, have instituted new general education requirements.

A core curriculum for all majors at A&M is being debated by the Faculty Senate now, Lutes said. She said she thinks it will pass, but does not know when.

"I think it's a great idea to expand," she said. "I think any student, no matter what his career goals are, is going to lose if they take a very narrow curriculum. I feel that a University degree means a certain amount of exposure to traditional university subjects."
