

Dishonesty

"The University policy is fairly lenient," Lutes said. "When a professor reports a case of scholastic dishonesty to the department head, the department head can only reduce the punishment that was recommended by the professor. Department heads don't have the authority to increase the penalty."

Stan Lowy, assistant dean of the College of Engineering, doesn't think concern for the student stops professors from reporting cases of scholastic dishonesty.

"Professors are only hesitant to report cheating if they are unsure that cheating has actually been committed," Lowy said. "The only problem I see with the University's cheating policy is that it lacks consistency."

The procedure followed in cheating cases tends to vary from college to college.

When there is a cheating case in the College of Engineering, the instructor will first speak to the student, and depending on the outcome, the dean's office may or may not ever hear the case, Lowy said.

"If the student admits to cheating the case can stop right there and the professor will assess a punishment," he said. "If the student feels the punishment is too severe he can come to our office with a complaint."

"If, after he's spoken to us, the student feels wronged we will turn the case over to the Department of Student Affairs."

The College of Business handles the initial steps of resolving a scholastic dishonesty case in a similar fashion, but later follows a different procedure.

"The problem is first dealt with between the student and professor," said Dr. Samuel Gillespie, assistant dean of the College of Business. "If they work it out, we (the dean's office) may never find out about the case and the department head may not be involved."

Some professors contact the dean's office because they aren't sure how to handle cheating cases, Gillespie said.

"If the professor hasn't outlined a cheating policy on the syllabus, it's the policy in our college to assign the student an F in the course and place them on conduct probation," Gillespie said.

"When a student is placed on conduct probation, the college sends a letter to the student explaining the punishment," he said, "and a copy is forwarded to Bill Kibler (in the student affairs department).

"If a student cheats in another college, the only way anyone would know that student is a repeat offender is through the records at student affairs."

Gillespie said that when students who have been placed on conduct probation for cheating graduate they can petition the College of Business and the student affairs office to remove the probation letter from their files.

Students enrolled in the graduate program at Texas A&M are governed by the same regulations as undergraduate students, as are students at the Texas A&M College of Medicine.

Students enrolled in the College of Veterinary Medicine are required to follow stricter guidelines.

"The vet school is under Texas A&M University regulations, but we also have a professional student handbook that spells out stricter regulations and penalties," said Dr. E.D. Gage, associate dean of academic programs for the College of Veterinary Medicine.

You'll probably find that most professional schools will have stricter policies (than universities), he said. Cheating is not a big problem at the veterinary college, Gage said. "We seldom have more than one or two cases a year."

Lutes said that some students feel that teachers are to blame for a large amount of cheating that goes on.

Last year, Lutes conducted a cheating survey in a junior level class. A majority of the 49 students she surveyed said that when a teacher left the room or didn't monitor students during tests they were just encouraging cheating.

"Sixty percent of the students admitted they've cheated in college," Lutes said, "but virtually none of them had been caught."

More than 70 percent of the students who admitted they've cheated said that when they cheat it is spontaneous. Most attributed their cheating to the fact that classrooms are crowded, making it easy to let your eyes wander.

The students who said they had premeditated cheating listed several methods they used, including writing on their body, keeping a notebook open at their feet, carrying cheat notes and writing notes on a calculator.

Kennedy trial continues

United Press International

WEST PALM BEACH, Fla. — According to sworn statements, Caroline Kennedy never entered the room where her cousin, David, was staying before he was found dead of a drug overdose.

The daughter of the late President John F. Kennedy said there was a policeman standing in front of the posh Brazilian Court Hotel when she and a friend drove up April 25, 1984, the day Kennedy's body was found.

"We went up to him and he said, 'That's all right girls, he is dead,'" the statement said.

She said she asked the hotel manager if she could use the phone to call her family.

"What did you do when the police told you he was dead?" asked Palm Beach County State Attorney David Bludworth.

"You just said, 'We want to use the telephone?'"

"I mean, I said, I think we said 'Oh my God' or hugged each other or something," she replied.

David Kennedy, the 28-year-old son of the late Sen. Robert Kennedy, had a history of drug abuse. Authorities said he died from an overdose of cocaine and two prescription drugs. Two hotel bellhops are awaiting trial on charges of supplying cocaine to Kennedy.

Bludworth was ordered to release the 39-page report by Circuit Judge John Born. He took the testimony from Caroline Kennedy in May during an interview with her in Washington, D.C.

There were rumors that she and a friend took evidence from the room before her cousin's body was found.

She denied the reports.
