Battle

UPS service OK'd in Texas

Associated Press

AUSTIN — After a 19-year battle, the Texas Railroad Commission on Monday authorized United Parcel Service to deliver packages between Texas cities.

But because of an anticipated court challenge, UPS' familiar fleet of brown trucks probably won't be making intrastate deliveries for a while, according to a company lawyer.

UPS long has been allowed to make shipments to and from other states, and some deliveries within Texas cities.

But a 1931 state law requiring package deliverers to operate on scheduled and regular routes barred UPS from Texas intercity service.

The Connecticut-based company offers on-demand, non-scheduled service. The order signed Monday by Commissioners Buddy Temple and Mack Wallace said UPS "proved that the services of existing carriers were inadequate."

Commissioner Jim Nugent, dissenting, said "The evidence in this case demonstrates the applicant does not intend to provide a service in accordance with present laws and regulations of the commission."

UPS' application was challenged by Tex-Pack Express, a group of Texas companies.

Tex-Pack lawyer Timothy Herman of Austin said his client would ask for a rehearing and then go to court.

"We'll do essentially what UPS did when they were ruled against," he said. "We take the position the statute as interpreted and enforced by the commission hasn't undergone any change."

The Texas Supreme Court never has ruled on the merits of the case.

Tex-Pack's battle against UPS stretches back as long as UPS' request. The Texas companies, in press releases, have called UPS the "greedy brown giant" and criticized the company as "a giant, automated out-of-state corporation owned by Easterners."

"Texas is just an awful lot different from Massachusetts or someplace," Tex-Pack spokesman Jake Westfall of Fort Worth said last year when it looked as if the commission was leaning toward approval of UPS' request.

"There's a long bunch of miles out there between towns in West Texas. They demand regular routes and schedules."

Bill to give teachers more power to punish

Associated Press

AUSTIN — Teachers would be able to act faster and tougher against students who bring firearms, drugs or alcohol to school under bills introduced Monday in the Legislature.

"The primary responsibility of a teacher is to teach — not to police troubled students," said Rep. Bill Haley, D-Center, sponsor of the bill in the House. "One troubled student shouldn't disrupt the learning process of other students who want to learn."

The bill's Senate sponsor, Sen. Hector Uribe, D-Brownsville, said the measure would give "teachers and school administrators broader authority to maintain discipline in our classrooms."

Currently, a student must be declared "incorrigible" and a danger to the school before the student can be removed from school.

Haley said under the new measure, a teacher can send a disruptive student to the principal, who in turn may suspend the student or send him to an alternative education program. Uribe said currently the only cause for immediate expulsion is an assault on a teacher while at school.
