country, then that's being yourself," he says. "For me, I was brought up this way."

But he says his choice of dress isolates him.

"You feel there are some people out there who wouldn't like you because of the way you dress," he says. "It would be hard to go up to someone in a pick-up truck chewing tobacco and introduce myself. There are people who say I look like a fag because of the way I dress and I say, 'Well if I dressed like you in wranglers and boots I wouldn't be a fag?' and they say 'That's right.' So in other words clothes make you gay."

"I don't think there's any way to relate how a guy acts to how a guy dresses," he says.

Both Emily and Mike agree there seems to be a lot more tolerance at A&M for people who are different than there used to be.

"I don't really care what they think of me," Mike says, "But it would be wonderful if people would say, 'Okay, this guy's different, but that's all right.'"

Chris Dominy, a senior mechanical engineering major, has reason to believe tolerance is not at all in style at A&M. Chris who has a six-inch long tail of hair, says he was assaulted by some men one night while walking across campus and has since filed charges.

"Wherever you go you're called a hippie," he says. "Wherever you go you're gawked at. And after a year it gets tiring.

Whenever I get tired of it I just tuck my hair in and look like Joe Blow."

Chris says that although some people come up and compliment him on his clothes or hair, others get very hostile about his looks.

Many of the more avant garde people at A&M go to Dr. G's on Wednesday nights. Ann says lately people have been going there just to watch, or laugh or cause trouble.

"That would be like me going to the Hall of Fame and getting belligerent because of the way people were dressed," she says. "Let them come out and watch or dance but not get angry about the way we look."
