Retail executive says confidence makes difference

By GIGI SHAMSY Reporter

A firm handshake and good eye contact are essential during a job interview and can land a graduate's first job, a retail executive said during the Retailing Career Fair Symposium Monday.

"Every company recruiter has their own style," said Rick Ruzza, Neiman-Marcus' coordinator for executive recruitment. "But they all look for a person who has a firm handshake and a confident demeanor."

The recruiters at Neiman-Marcus headquarters in downtown Dallas interviewed 800 to 1,000 applicants every graduation season, he said.

"Only 22 of these applicants are finally chosen," Ruzza said. "Unfortunately, we end up turning away many outstanding people because of the limited positions available."

A humble attitude, good posture and leadership skills are traits which set a person apart from their competitors during an interview, Ruzza said.

Ruzza said the recruiters for Neiman-Marcus start the interview with five minutes of casual conversation about the applicant's hometown or interests to put the applicant at ease.

"We inform the person what to expect in the next half hour of the interview," he said. "This is when we discover why the person is interested in Neiman-Marcus and in retailing."

"I cringe when I hear the excuse 'I want to be a buyer because I love traveling' or 'I really love to shop.'"

He said students should avoid saying "I love working with people" unless it is essential to the conversation.

The applicant should listen carefully to the recruiter's questions and should not stray away from the subject at hand, he said.

Ruzza said students with a grade point ratio less than 2.4 are rarely considered for a job. Interviewees with a low GPR should justify the reason for this, he said.

"These people should stress diversions they may have had — such as a part-time job or a difficult course load," he said.

It is important for the interviewee to mention all relevant work experience that may relate to the job, Ruzza said.

"It is beneficial for the student to also possess a realistic attitude about the job," Ruzza added. "He must see the stress and long hours often involved in the job instead of just the glamour."

A student's attractive physical appearance and flawless resume are essential in presenting a good image to the company, he said.

Ruzza said if the recruiters are interested in the applicant, the applicant is invited to a final interview.

"Above all, the student should be himself and remember that interviewing is not a one-way street for either the interviewee or the company," Ruzza said.

Ruzza spoke at the symposium in the place of Neiman-Marcus Vice President Radd Johnson.
