Caperton

has a job to provide an on-going systematic review of higher education," Caperton said.

He said a comprehensive, long-range plan for higher education in Texas probably would show that "universities should focus on their areas of strength, instead of trying to be all things to all people."

"This doesn't mean we should turn our backs on other areas. For example, not everyone can have the top engineering college in the nation. This doesn't mean we should ignore liberal arts at A&M, but that we must pay attention to the stronger areas too."

He said the Legislature's top priority will be maintaining adequate funding for higher education.

"I want the message to go out through Texas and throughout the rest of this country, that Texas is not going to retreat from our commitment to quality higher education," he said.

Caperton commended Texas A&M President Frank Vandiver for having the courage to say the LBB's proposed 20 percent budget cut would be disastrous for the University.

"I believe it to be true," he said. "I believe it to be incumbent on A&M to save money, but no ongoing organization or institution can suffer a 20 percent cut without traumatic and serious effects. Businesses can't do it, agencies can't do it, and schools certainly can't do it."
