Lady's indiscretion leads to missing beef

Associated Press

HOUSTON — A supermarket security guard wasn't kidding when she asked a 24-year-old Houston woman, "Where's the beef?"

Humble Police Department on Feb. 2 received a call from a Kroger grocery store wanting help with "a belligerent shoplifter," Assistant Chief Don Maddox said.

Maddox said a store security guard stopped the customer after seeing her take meat from the butcher section of the store, which is about 20 miles north of Houston.

Officers arriving at the supermarket found the guard struggling with the woman, Maddox said.

However, it wasn't the scuffle that surprised the police.

"The officers noticed something hanging from her panties," Maddox said. "And when they took her to the police car, meat fell out."

"Inside her panties was a 12.85 pound ribeye roast and a 1.55-pound package of beefsteaks and another pound and a half of beefsteaks and another two pounds of beefsteaks," Maddox said. "The rest was in her handbag."

Maddox said the woman was found carrying 27 pounds of meat valued at $113.

"I don't think I'd want to barbecue that evidence," Maddox said, chuckling.

Cynthia Oakley, 24, of Houston, pleaded innocent Friday to burglary charges. The second-degree felony carries a penalty of two to 10 years in prison and a maximum $10,000 fine.

She was held in Harris County jail Monday in lieu of $5,000 bond.

time in the semester for course modifications. These forms are analyzed by instructors and shared with the classes.

The final questionnaire evaluates the instructor and influences promotion, tenure and salary considerations. The evaluations are reviewed and modifications are made as quickly and effectively as possible, Peters says.

The different areas within the evaluation are meant to support each other rather than outweigh each other, Peters says.

"Research can support teaching by keeping a professor up-to-date," he says.

Peters says his department does conduct follow-up studies, surveying former students by phone for their reactions to professors.

Often a professor will be appreciated for the knowledge provided in the course, not the grade given, Peters says.

Students should realize their opinions are significant, he says.

"I wish I could tell them how many hours I spend going through them (the evaluations) myself," Peters says.

Sean Royall, the student representative to the Faculty Senate, is researching the possibility of publishing instructor and course evaluations.

"We'd like to see the interest and support of the faculty and students on the idea, and eventually we'd like to work together," Royall says.

Royall says he is concerned with providing departments information about faculty, and allowing the students the chance to provide effective feedback.

Johnson says the Student Government published faculty evaluations about five years ago. He says the program was disastrous. The results were impossible to deal with, Johnson says.

"One professor only had one evaluation filled out on him, so he had a fabulous record," Johnson says. "Others were unethical in soliciting evaluations, and some students filled out the questionnaires with the idea of 'let's get the prof.'"

Peters says the publication of evaluations wouldn't help students because perceptions differ drastically.

As director of the Center for Teaching Excellence, Johnson heads a service program to aid professors in teaching methods. The service also can assist administrators in evaluating teaching effectiveness and encourage innovative teaching.

The service is optional, Johnson says, but many departments consistently attend its conferences and seek help from the center.
