Soviet space toilet tops U.S. system

Associated Press

HOUSTON SPACE CENTER, Houston — Toilet facilities are simpler and work better on Soviet spacecraft than aboard the American space shuttle, according to a French astronaut who flew aboard the Russian craft.

Frenchman Jean-Loup Chretien, who flew in the Soviet Salyut and Soyuz spacecraft, said the cosmonauts use a toilet system that uses air to collect the solid waste in a bag.

He told the Houston Chronicle the bag is then sealed, placed into a larger bag which is later put into a big aluminum can. When the can is filled, it is jettisoned into space.

For the space shuttle, the National Aeronautics and Space Administration spent $12 million for a potty design by General Electric. As with the Soviet system, the shuttle toilet uses air pressure to collect the wastes, but processing and storage of the wastes is more complicated and less reliable.

Both spacefaring nations faced the same engineering problem in developing a space toilet. The human anatomy was designed to use gravity to dispose of its wastes. The matter is ejected and carried away by gravity, and, in modern society, flushed out of sight by water.

But in orbit, where there is no gravity, a new system had to be used.

The space shuttle toilet consists of a throne that draws air from the cabin. A user's backside is sealed to the seat and air pressure carries away the waste matter.

At first, the shuttle toilet included a motor-driven slinger that was to break up the solid waste particles and distribute them on the insides of the bowl. The matter was then freeze-dried and the resulting dust carried away by air pressure.

Astronauts complained on flight after flight that the system failed, often resulting in a tan haze inside the space cabin. The toilet also froze during one flight, and on another mission an astronaut had the unpleasant task of cleaning a tube jammed with a putty-like brown material.

But Dan Germany, manager of the shuttle flight equipment office at the Johnson Space Center, said he now believes the shuttle toilet problem has been solved.

'Cheers' Coach dies of a heart attack at 61

Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Actor Nick Colasanto, who portrayed the lovable bartender "Coach" on the NBC comedy series "Cheers," died Tuesday of a heart attack at his home, a network spokesman said. He was 61.

Colasanto was recuperating from a recent hospital stay for a heart ailment when he suffered the attack while watching television, said Bill Kiley, NBC's director of publicity for comedy shows.

Colasanto's doctor had said the actor was feeling fine Monday when the physician talked to him, Kiley said.

Colasanto, who also was an accomplished director, had missed filming of the last five episodes of the popular series because of illness, Kiley said. Four episodes remain to be filmed.

Friends and co-workers had become concerned because Colasanto had lost so much weight recently, Kiley said.
