Officials protect rights to use stadium

Associated Press

EL PASO — The Sun Bowl stands empty about 225 days a year, yet the University of Texas at El Paso consistently nixes attempts to make use of the stadium with non-football events, frustrated businessmen and university supporters say.

Among the events the university has said "no" to are a World Cup soccer qualifying match, a Rolling Stones concert and a Minnesota Vikings-San Diego Chargers exhibition football game, The El Paso Times reported Sunday.

El Paso voters passed a $1.75 million bond issue in 1960 to build the stadium. But in return for donating 62.8 acres of land, the university got a 99-year lease on the stadium at $1 a year. It has the option to renew the lease for another 99 years.

The lease gives the university complete control over the county-owned stadium. It also subjects the Sun Bowl to strict University of Texas System regulations that prohibit the use of its buildings for outside profit.

"It is not right for a publicly owned facility to be used for private gain," UTEP President Haskell Monroe said in a written statement to the Times.

That policy, which also applies to the city's largest indoor arena, the university's 12,000-seat Special Events Center, is keeping large-scale entertainment and sports events out of El Paso, say several frustrated civic boosters.

The next largest arenas, the Civic Center grand hall and the decrepit county Coliseum, can hold only about 8,000 people.

"There are a lot of big promoters who won't even consider the Coliseum, and we have nothing larger," said Jean Kahn, chairwoman of the Greater El Paso Civic, Convention and Tourist Center. "Several groups in El Paso want to bring in big concerts, and they just haven't been able to do it."

Sports promoters have the same problem.

El Paso businessman John Kettle, who headed a long-shot effort to bring the United States Football League's San Antonio Gunslingers to the Sun Bowl, contends the university could earn $1 million a year through aggressive use of the Sun Bowl and Special Events Center. Kettle said the money could help offset state-mandated cuts in the university's budget.

The university's budget complaints "are akin to the little boy who cries wolf," Kettle said. "They're sitting on their facilities. They can generate a tremendous amount of money if they would only allow them to be used."

"And the irony is that the taxpayers have footed the bill for all this," Kettle said.

Actually, the university footed an even larger bill — $6.5 million — in 1981 to expand the stadium 51,000 seats from the original 32,000.
