New TDC construction may face state review

Associated Press

AUSTIN — The Texas House voted Monday to strip the Texas Department of Corrections of its power to build facilities without the review of state officials in Austin.

Duncanville Rep. Ray Keller's bill, which faces another House vote, would put the State Purchasing and General Services Commission in charge of prison construction.

Keller, chairman of the House Law Enforcement Committee, has complained that prison officials have wasted construction money in recent years.

The bill won tentative voice vote approval without debate. Rep. Harold Dutton, D-Houston, tried to amend the bill to guarantee that minority-owned businesses would get prison construction contracts.

He said his proposal would "at least expand the opportunity for minority people to take advantage of the benefit of all those construction dollars."

Keller fought the amendment, saying it would be "totally unworkable." He said it was the same language that minority legislators put in the horse race betting bill that died on the floor earlier this month.

"It would drive the cost of construction to astronomic levels, even more than they are now," Keller said before the House voted 95-40 to kill Dutton's amendment.

Also Monday, the House gave tentative approval to a measure authorizing county officials to accept credit card payment of fines and fees. A 5 percent fee could be added to the fine or fee to cover processing costs.
