surpasses the campus average and that the enviroment alone provides opportunities for academic advancement.

Seifert says that in recent years relations between campus and Greeks have become better. Chi Omega sorority sponsors Songfest every year in conjunction with student government and Panhellenic is now working with the Corps of Cadets to raise money for the March to the Brazos.

Lucas says another misconception is that fraternities are elitist and draw students out of the Aggie community.

"The Aggies will always be a close-knit group," he says. "I think the general opinion is that they will always be an Aggie first and whatever else their fraternity affiliation is second."

Sororities and fraternities have been a source of conflict at A&M since they first appeared and most of the controversy has centered on the question of recognition. Sigma Phi Epsilon petitioned for recognition in 1977, the first and only fraternity to do so. A subject of public debate and many letters to the editor, the matter raged on unresolved while the Greeks continued to grow in the shadowy realm of non-recognition.

Edwards says the issue has been eclipsed by the Zentgraf and GSS cases but that official recognition is very much on the minds of the I.F.C. Both Lucas and Blinderman agree.

"Dr. Koldus realizes that we're here," Blinderman says. "We're merely an umbrella group. I.F.C. is not a social organization, only a governing body for them."

Lucas says he thinks recognition is bound to happen sooner or later and that from the standpoint of the University, it could be a very good thing.

"They're getting so big here that it would be hard to stick your head in the sand and pretend they don't exist," he says. "If A&M is to become a world university, it needs to become more like other universities around the country. The presence of a Greek system is very important."

We're looking for a few good men.
