Teen-ager assaults classmate

Associated Press

SAN ANTONIO — A teen-ager who said he was being harassed by other students shot and wounded a classmate at a middle school Tuesday.

The 14-year-old suspect later turned a .22-caliber pistol over to assistant principal J.D. Brown and surrendered voluntarily.

Jose Luis Herrera, 16, was in stable condition at Santa Rosa Hospital condition with a single gunshot wound to the chest, said spokesman Donald Lee.

The shooting on the playground of Page Middle School on the city's southeast side occurred at 7:45 a.m. before classes began.

Brown said he was standing about 100 yards from the playground when he heard what sounded like a firecracker.

"The wounded boy walked clear to our office," Brown said. "He wasn't even helped in there. I laid him down, then had to sit him up because he began choking. He had blood in his mouth."

The assistant principal said he later saw the shooting suspect outside the boys' bathroom door.

The youth later was charged with aggravated assault with a deadly weapon.

The wounded youth was taken to Santa Rosa Hospital, where spokeswoman Molly Gofron said his vital signs were stable.

pleted, probably at the end of the week.

UTPB is an upper division school that opened in 1973. It has about 1,800 students. Colbert said UTPB never has attracted enough students to make it worthwhile.

A&M at Galveston has about 500 students. It trains harbor pilots and marine scientists. The school also isn't needed, according to Colbert.

Lawmakers from Odessa and Galveston said Colbert is uninformed.

"I'm really upset with Rep. Colbert," said Rep. Lloyd Criss, D-Texas City. "I doubt if he knows anything about that school. It provides a service. It educates people."

"He said all it does is teach people to steer ships and that's not true at all."

Rep. Kelly Godwin, R-Odessa, said UTPB is not a "luxury."

"It's very much a necessity in West Texas," Godwin said. "The long-range answer is to elevate it to a four-year school."

UTPB officials have tried to win legislative approval to add freshman and sophomore classes.

Godwin said he understands why the committee did what it did to his local college.

"The problem is those people on appropriations work long days," he said. "When it gets to the end of the day and everybody is telling them to cut, the opportunity came up and they did it."

Former Rep. Jay Gibson, who lost to Godwin last November, also worked in the Capitol to reverse the vote. Gibson was in town to lobby on another matter.

"I never really dreamed something like this would happen," Gibson said. "Bang. It happened. It was kind of a mob mentality — let's cut everything. This is a tough session. With the idea of making cuts you just get overzealous sometimes."

House Speaker Gib Lewis did not like the committee decision to kill the schools.

"I don't really agree with the approach they took last night, and I'm sure they are going to correct that today," he said, adding that he had told Rudd he didn't like the move.

The committee's decision highlights the need for a comprehensive look at state colleges, according to Lewis.

"That's one reason we are going to have an interim study similar to the Perot committee to look at universities," he said, referring to H. Ross Perot's panel that pushed public school reform last year.

"Those universities that can stand up and be accountable will be recognized as that," Lewis said. "If there are some universities that cannot do that, we are going to have to address them at that point and take some steps to solve them."

"I'd say at this time it would be unwise for us to try to go in through the appropriations process and try to close down anyone," he said as he draped his arm around Colbert.

"I'm just trying to avoid a tax bill," Colbert told Lewis.

In addition to clearing the way for reconsideration of the votes on UTPB and A&M at Galveston, the committee voted to take another look at a Monday decision to cut $1 million a year from state aid to private university students.

Tourism could benefit economy

Associated Press

AUSTIN — Increasing the money the state spends on luring tourists to Texas would generate up to $2.9 billion in economic activity, according to a study released Monday.

The Texas Travel Industry Congress study said spending $14 million — primarily on advertising — would generate between $2.2 billion and $2.9 billion in economic activity over the next two years.

Increase sales taxes, hotel taxes, fuel taxes and alcohol taxes could bring the state treasury between $51 million and $67 million over the two years, the study said.

"There has been a hue and cry from across the state to look elsewhere for (financial) relief," said Rep. Ralph Wallace, D-Houston, vice president of the travel congress.

"I think it's time we all took a hard look at what the tourism industry can produce in terms of tax revenue for the state," Wallace said.

Greg Ortale, president of the tourism organization, said the increased state spending would return from $157 to $207 for every dollar expended.

He said the study indicates the higher spending would create 42,000 additional jobs.

Bright

done an outstanding job, but it "was time for a change."

"I voted for Reynolds," Mobley said. "He's not a former student, but I think he's brought a new perspective to the board."

Mobley said that "no one controls my vote."

"For someone to tell me that I don't have the integrity to vote my own conscience on an issue is extremely irritating," he said. "This is where Mr. Bright was out of line."

Mobley said he has "a very deep regret that he (Bright) has resigned."

Regent Royce Wisenbaker said Tuesday that Bright "basically is just being childish" because he was not re-elected chairman.

"I had a bet with Mr. Reynolds that he would get up and stalk out," he said. "I just lost a dollar."

Wisenbaker also said Bright is "trying to put Mark White in a position that would hurt him politically — because he's a Republican and White's a Democrat."

Regent John Coleman, a Houston physician, said Bright's resignation came as a surprise.

He said White does not try to influence decisions of the board.

"I have eight years on the board," Coleman said, "and not one time has the governor ever called me about a decision. He has influence, but since I've been on the board, he hasn't used it."

"If he did, it would be in the best interests of the people of Texas through this agency."

Bright, 64, was appointed to the A&M Board of Regents in 1981 by Republican Gov. Bill Clements. His six-year term would have ended in 1987.

Eller, 47, is chairman and CEO of Granada Corp. and American National Petroleum Co. He was appointed to the board in 1983 and his term expires in 1989. His term as chairman expires in 1985. He is the youngest member of the board.

In other business, the regents voted to rename the Plant Sciences Building in honor of L.F. Peterson, who graduated from A&M in 1936. A regent from 1963 to 1975, Peterson, a retired petroleum engineering consultant, lives in Fort Worth.

"I think he's the best Aggie I know of," Wisenbaker said. "He's consistently tried to help A&M. I just can't think of anything he hasn't done."

NASA to use rats in study of space effects

Associated Press

HOUSTON — Two dozen rats will be killed in the interest of science after spending seven days orbiting the Earth aboard the space shuttle, NASA scientists announced Monday.

The rats will be used to study the changes, on a cellular level, of weightlessness.

Paul X. Callahan, a scientist at NASA's Ames Research Center in California, said the study of the rats is essential for gaining a thorough understanding of how weightlessness affects living tissue in outer space.

Callahan said the experiment's success depends upon sacrificing the rats as quickly as possible after they return to the Earth's atmosphere. The animals, he said, will start readapting quickly after leaving space and that major data will be lost if the rats live for 12 hours after returning to Earth.

"If we can get them back (in the Kennedy Space Center lab) within three hours after landing, we'll be able to get all of the important parameters of the study," Callahan said.
