Program against repeat offenders needed: Cisneros

Associated Press

SAN ANTONIO — Mayor Henry Cisneros is billing an intensive campaign to retire career criminals as the "highest priority" in the next municipal budget.

City officials say the multimillion-dollar war on crime employs increased police surveillance with sophisticated equipment, undercover informants and sting operations to catch repeat offenders.

"The goal is simple: convict them and send them away for a long time," said Bexar County District Attorney Sam Millsap. "I think we'll convict more of these maggots and send them away if we concentrate our resources as the mayor and I have suggested."

The campaign to target suspected criminals for intensive investigation and prosecution is patterned on a successful Washington, D.C. program, officials said.

Authorities said plans for San Antonio's repeat offender project call for 40 to 50 officers to be detailed for surveillance of people whom police believe will commit crimes.

Officials said the project will cost about $2.3 million in the first year.

In addition to a special 40-man police unit, the program involves a team of assistant district attorneys who would work with police on identifying likely targets, bringing them in and prosecuting them successfully.

Prosecutors will, however, study legal and constitutional questions that may arise from targeting known criminals for special treatment by authorities.

"What we're doing right now is dealing with this from a legal standpoint, not a 'civil liberties' standpoint," Millsap said. "We're looking at what is permissible under the law. As district attorney, I'll be guided to the answers to that question."

Four San Antonio officials will go to Washington this week to observe the three-year-old Repeat Offender Processing and Enforcement project.

Its head, Inspector Edward Spurlock, said ROPE employs 60 officers. Both officers and informants made extensive use of taping targets in the act of committing or planning a crime.

Tribute
Bob Wills remembered

Associated Press

TURKEY, Texas — Thousands of die-hard fans braved a rainy weekend to pay tribute to the king of western swing during the 14th annual Bob Wills Day celebration.

About 5,000 gathered Saturday for a parade, barbecue and musical performances by the Original Texas Playboys, all of whom were with Wills when he shot to stardom in the 1930s.

"I saw a note on the back of a Bob Wills record album about this event and being somewhat of a Bob Wills freak, I came on down," said Dave Kinnaman of Denver, Colo.

Bill Wakefield, a jazz student at Amarillo College, said he has attended the Bob Wills Day celebration since he was 8 years old.

"It's kind of a traditional thing," he said. "I like this style of music. It's proof of what good country music can be."

Betty Wills, the singer's widow, said the crowds come year after year to this southeastern Texas Panhandle town, where Wills developed his distinctive style.

"They enjoy getting together and swapping old stories about Bob," she said. "Regardless of the weather today, they like to just get out here and have a good time."

Following Wills' death in 1975, Mrs. Wills was faced with the problem of trying to keep the true sound of the Texas Playboys. Many groups claimed to be part of the group.

Her efforts eventually led to the formation of the Original Texas Playboys that performed Saturday in Turkey.

Prior to the performance Saturday, Mrs. Wills reminisced about her husband. She said she first met Wills in 1941 when she went to her first public dance at the Cains Academy in Tulsa, Okla.

"I'd gone up to the front of the stage where he was playing to request a song," she said. "When he finished, he leaned over and asked 'What can I do for you, little lady?' When I went to tell him I couldn't remember the name of the song."

After making arrangements through mutual friends, Bob and Betty met backstage after the performance. After nearly eight months of dating, they were married in the spring of 1942, she said.

Bikers pay respects to Bandidos leader

Associated Press

CORPUS CHRISTI — A funeral chapel resounded with country-western music and bikers filled the parking lot as members of the Bandidos Motorcycle Club paid their last respects to their leader.

More than 200 bikers from across the country gathered Saturday to escort the body of Alvin Chester "Big Al" Frakes to the airport and a final trip home.

Frakes, 46, national president of the motorcycle club, died April 23 after a seven-year bout with cancer. His body was flown to his hometown of Nashville, where he will be buried Tuesday.

Some people passed out religious tracts as club members drank beer and repaired their bikes in the parking lot.

"One of the hardest things I've ever had to do is explain my feelings for Big Al," said club member Ronnie Hodge during the eulogy. "I never met anyone who met him whose life was not affected. He was a unique person."

Frakes' wife Susan said she was touched by the service.

"I am very pleased with the turnout and I don't even like bikes," she said. "There were people from all walks of life here, and they all knew him for what he was."

Expert disapproves sterilizing in exchange for free health care

Associated Press

HOUSTON — A demographics expert says he opposes a Houston lawmaker's proposal that impoverished mothers be sterilized in exchange for free medical care.

James William Brackett, director of policy studies for the Population Institute in Washington, D.C., said family planning and birth control counseling are better approaches.

State Rep. Brad Wright, R-Houston, recently proposed that poor, pregnant women voluntarily undergo tubal ligations if they get tax-supported medical care.

Brackett said studies show most people in nations throughout the world would use birth control if it were available to them.

"We're interested in encouraging countries to provide family planning services so individual couples can determine the number and spacing of their children," he said.

A recent World Fertility Survey of women in 41 developing countries showed 50 percent of the women did not want any more children and 25 percent wanted to delay pregnancy.

Brackett said that in most countries, birth rates decreased after the government offered family planning services.

Mexico, for example, began family planning services in 1973.

"At that time, they became quite concerned about the problems of urbanization, pollution in the cities, unemployment and so on, and they launched a family planning program," he said. "Within 10 years, the birth rate dropped by one-third."

In some African nations, a woman must give birth to six children in hopes that one son will survive.

Brackett said the United States has funded international family planning programs since 1968 and Congress has budgeted $290 million for the program this year.
