Challenger has problems

Associated Press

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. — Seven astronauts and a mini-zoo of monkeys and rats rocketed away from Earth Monday on a scientific space expedition plagued with several problems.

The launch, the second this month for the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, was nearly perfect. The first of the satellites ejected properly from a canister in the cargo bay. But two tries failed to dislodge the second satellite. "No joy on the GLOMR deploy," said commander Robert Overmyer. The initials stand for global low orbiting message relay satellite; it had been intended to be used by the Navy to relay signals from remote sensors like those on ocean weather buoys.

It was not immediately known what caused the failure, but there had been prelaunch worry that the batteries — the $2 drug-store variety 9-volt kind used in transistor radios — might not work after prolonged time in space.

The crew was able to close the canister that had contained the failed satellite, averting a need for a space walk to tie the lid down for re-entry.

The satellite that was released, called NUSAT for northern Utah satellite, is designed to calibrate air traffic control radars. It was built by students at two colleges in Utah and one in New Mexico with materials and money provided by aerospace companies and government agencies.

Another problem was an ambly device, newly added to the shuttle toilet, that sprayed urine into the cabin.

"We have attempted to use the urine monitoring system," said William Thornton. "On the flush cycles it was blowing water all over the place and after extensive cleanup, we have discontinued use of that."

Thornton said when the device was not activated, the toilet was operating well. The device was to perform one of the 15 experiments carried aboard.

Challenger, which has not flown since October, had other malfunctions. Communications were poor and Thornton complained he could not talk to the cockpit crew while he was in the Spacelab — although the ground heard them both.

Other problems included false readings on instruments, wrong computer readouts, fire alarm tests that did not light during a test, and an early shutdown of the hydraulic system that moves the shuttle's wing surfaces on ascent and for landing. The system is not used while the shuttle is in space and Mission Specialist said it posed no problem.

ment, watches the youngsters' right to be raised by their parents without harm.

Sue Ann Jackson, a spokeswoman for the human resources department, says the child welfare department and the police are required to exchange information on child neglect or abuse. While the police handle criminal investigations of abuse cases, the child welfare department conducts a civil investigation.

Because children must be removed from situations in which parents neglect or abuse them, the state has developed a foster care program. Under this program, the state pays people to care for youngsters who must temporarily leave their parents.

The foster care agency in the Bryan-College Station area is presently having difficulty finding foster care for children. Brazos County has 20 licensed foster homes, and all of them are running at capacity for foster-care placement.

Jackson says the child welfare department gets an average of 50 calls per month about child abuse or neglect. Of those calls, over 50 percent result in further investigation.

"We accept anonymous referrals, but we like to know their (the callers') names," Jackson says. "It's confidential. And we really need a name, so we can call back and tell them what we're going to do."

Jackson says the agency likes to keep in touch with people who make referrals, just in case the agency needs more information. Sometimes the investigators are unable to find a family, and the agency contacts the callers to help in the search for the children. Or, if the investigation is discontinued, callers may be able to give further evidence.

While an investigation is going on, children are temporarily placed with a foster parent. Foster parents don't have to live in the same county that the child's family does. The child remains in a foster home until they return to their families or until other arrangements, such as adoption, can be made.

Gail Bradbury, a spokesperson for the foster home division of the human resources department, says the B-CS area is seeing a need for foster care for children who need long-term placement. The agency is looking for homes for pre-school, teen-agers, siblings and minorities.

"We have been placing children in homes of different racial and ethnic groups because of the shortage of homes," Bradbury says. "Normally we try to keep them in homes that reflect their ethnic heritage."

Bradbury says applicants for foster parent position have to go through several steps before they can get a license. She says foster parents reflect a variety of backgrounds. Some of them have children and don't. Some are single, others are married.

The agency looks for people who have experience with children, she says, yet some foster parents are having the parenting experience for the first time. Applicants who are married must have been wed for at least two years, Bradbury says. The agency wants to give married couples a chance to get adjusted to married life before they take on child responsibilities.

Since foster homes in the area are short on space, Sheltering Arms emergency shelter, also has been busy caring for foster children. Joyce Barks, an administrator at Sheltering Arms, says the shelter has turned children away because it has been filled to capacity.

The number of children at the shelter varies, she says. When the shelter housed only two children in February, 19 were housed in March.

Children remain at Sheltering Arms until they can return to their families or until residential homes are found, Barks says.
