When Johnston arrived at his office, 334A Blocker, Tuesday morning he found that it had been burglarized.

"Someone apparently dropped into his (Johnston's) office for the exams," Wiatt said. "None of the exams were in the office so whoever is looking is still without an exam."

"Group is to provide a place where Macintosh owners can meet to solve problems, trade information and receive public domain software.

Public domain software are programs that are made available to the public, at no charge, by the people who wrote them. The Apple Computer Company has formed a consortium of 25 universities to develop public domain software. Among the schools involved are Stanford and the University of Texas.

A users group, such as the A&M group, is a vital link in getting the software to users, Smith says.

"Probably the best distribution process is through a users group,"

Smith founded the group after his own search for a users group on campus. 'I was looking myself to find a us-

During his search for a group, Smith crossed paths with several other Macintosh owners who also were searching for a users' group.
Out of those meetings the Texas A&M Macintosh Users Group was

Because the Macintosh is relatively easy for people who have little computer training to use, Smith says the meetings will be geared toward the non-technical user.

Group members will be able to buy additional software programs from the users' group, and Smith says members will be charged only
