Baptist leader: Denomination's future not bright

Associated Press

DALLAS — In Texas, both winners and losers at this week's Southern Baptist Convention are predicting a slow erosion of the country's largest Protestant denomination if the six-year rift within the ranks continues.

"I think if we don't deal with our differences in a constructive way, we could see a split in time. We can't go on indefinitely like this," said the Rev. Jimmy Draper, a fundamentalist and past president of the convention.

The Rev. Morris Chapman of Wichita Falls, another fundamentalist leader, agreed.

"I think there will be no formal split," said Chapman, who helped moderate the convention and planned the agenda. "I think there's always the possibility there could be some slight erosion."

He and Draper were among the winners at the convention, which ended Thursday. Along with more than 24,000 other delegates, they voted to re-elect president Charles Stanley, pastor of the First Baptist Church of Atlanta.

Stanley defeated the more moderate Rev. Winfred Moore of Amarillo by a 55 percent to 45 percent vote.

Among those in the disgruntled minority were the Rev. Cecil Sherman, who recently left a church in Asheville, N.C., for one in Fort Worth.

He was an outspoken critic of the fundamentalists' handling of the convention, particularly Stanley's refusal to recognize some delegates on the convention floor during a key vote Wednesday.

"Down the way, if over a long enough period of time this group prevails, and exclusion is practiced toward the losing minority... there will be some kind of division," Sherman said.

He believes any such split will occur in "the old South way. There won't be thousands of churches going away and forming a new denomination," he said, "but quietly, they'll go away."

Sherman also predicted the pro-fundamentalist leaning of this Baptist convention will encourage more cases of secret tape recordings and greater efforts to rid seminaries of non-fundamentalist professors.

On the fundamentalist side, Chapman said no one is talking of a "witch hunt."

But he added that those with extreme differences with the views of the majority may feel "their contribution in the ministry would not be through the Southern Baptist Convention."

The theological differences within the denomination have had far-ranging effects.

At Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary in Fort Worth, for example, one professor in a dispute with the administrator secretly taped a confrontation with him in January.

Meanwhile, the outlook for a "peace committee" approved by the convention messengers to try to deal with the Baptists' philosophical divide is unclear, some leaders said.

Chili war Texas-New Mexico controversy heats up over national food

Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A proposal to make chili the national food has erupted into red-hot debate on Capitol Hill, embroiling New Mexico and Texas in a tongue-in-cheek clash.

Is it "chili" or "chile"? Not to mention the more incendiary question, "To bean or not to bean?"

"Where I come from, we spell it 'c-h-i-l-e,'" says Manuel Lujan, R-N.M.

He has introduced House Joint Resolution 255, "to provide for the designation of chile as the official food of the United States of America."

Under Lujan's resolution "chile" would be right up there with the bald eagle, the Star-Spangled Banner and the flag.

From a basic philosophical standpoint, this is fine with J.J. "Jake" Pickle, D-Austin.

Nevertheless, he introduced his own chili resolution.

Why is Pickle so picky? Why did he eschew Lujan's resolution?

"His reasoning was it had beans in it," Lujan said. "He wouldn't have anything to do with chile with beans, so he introduced his own resolution."

Pickle's version of the legislation would designate chili — with an "i" and without beans — as the national official food.

The first shot in the "chili war" was fired back in April, when Lujan rejected Pickle's chili — without beans — recipe. Rising to the defense of his Texas colleague, Rep. Eligio "Kika" de la Garza, D-Missouri, said Lujan "didn't know a chili from a chestnut."

"That's like declaring war in the Southwest," said Lujan's press secretary, Steve Goldstein.

The controversy has elicited diplomacy worthy of the Geneva armistice talks from the two combatants' Capitol Hill colleagues.

Lujan proudly noted that one of the co-sponsors of his version of the resolution is a Texan, Dallas Republican Steve Bartlett.

"The congressman is an advocate of chili of choice," explained Bartlett's administrative assistant, Marjorie Maddox. "He believes everyone should have the right to choose the chili to chew."

Grand jury calls on Texas Rangers in Lucas inquiry

Associated Press

WACO — Members of the Texas Rangers Homicide Task Force who investigated alleged serial killer Henry Lee Lucas testified Thursday before the McLennan County grand jury that it is probing the validity of some of Lucas' confessions.

The task force members arrived at the courthouse clad in suits and white cowboy hats.

Among those appearing before the grand jury were Rangers Bob Prince and Clayton Smith, Williamson County Sheriff Jim Boutwell and Department of Public Safety criminal investigator Bob Werner, the primary members of the task force.

Attorney General Jim Mattox, who along with local District Attorney Vic Feazell, initiated the McLennan County probe, led the questioning of Col. Jim Adams, the head of the Department of Public Safety.

The first called was Sgt. Prince, who spent nearly five hours testifying.

"I think they were very interested in hearing my side of the story," he said. "They are very professional jurors."

Prince said that, as required by law, he would not discuss specifics of what he was questioned about inside the jury room, but he was not surprised by the questions asked.

He said the jurors did not question him about alleged "unethical or improper" activities of the task force.

Following Prince into the jury room was Ron Boyter, a DPS intelligence officer based in Waco. He said the grand jury had specifically requested his presence.

Boyter said he has never been associated with the task force and has never interviewed Lucas.

When asked if he has been involved in an alleged DPS investigation of Feazell, Boyter said, "No comment."

Last month, Feazell told news reporters he had a conference with Col. Adams in April, and Adams told Feazell that he had initiated a DPS probe of Feazell.

Adams has neither confirmed nor denied the investigation, although he said an investigation would not have been initiated unless there was justification. The FBI also is conducting a probe of Feazell and activities in his office.

The grand jury was scheduled to reconvene Friday morning.

Amid speculation that the 8-week-old grand jury investigation may soon be completed, the task force members said during the morning that they were pleased with the opportunity to present their versions of the Lucas investigation to the grand jury.

Published reports have revealed that Lucas, who at one time claimed to have killed hundreds of people, may have been hundreds of miles away from some of the murders that were termed solved by authorities in several states with assistance from the task force.

Texas schools need to be the best

White: survival depends on schools

AUSTIN — A spokesman for grade school administrators pledged to Gov. Mark White on Thursday that Texas will have the best elementary education program in the United States.

White, after receiving a rousing welcome from the Texas Elementary Principals and Supervisors Association, told administrators the nation's survival depends on how well they do their job.

Brad Duggan, association executive director, introduced White to an audience of 1,200 by saying, "There have been a lot of men and women who claim to be education governors of Texas but there is only one governor who's taken the bold step to restructure and, important to us, reprioritize education, a step to create an equitable education system and to place an emphasis on elementary education."

White's name, if not political reputation, is closely linked to a 1984 special legislative session that provided $2.7 billion for public school reform.

"Starting this year, when you see bright-eyed disadvantaged and language-deficient 4-year-olds coming to school to try to get a chance to survive in the state of Texas," Duggan said, "you need to thank the governor."

White said having the best education system — through college — the country may not be good enough.

Student to see dye laser take off with shuttle

Associated Press

EL PASO — Clay Casarez thought a television screen view of the space shuttle Discovery carrying his scientific experiment would be the closest glimpse he would get.

But last-minute offers from sponsors to finance his return flight will allow the Texas Tech University electrical engineering sophomore to witness Monday's scheduled launch of the space shuttle at the launch site.

The pending shuttle flight signifies the end of an elusive dream for Casarez, who has worked since eighth grade on a small dye laser that will be among 11 student projects flying into space if the Discovery takes off Monday.

"I always knew my project would eventually be carried on the shuttle, but until recently I wasn't exactly sure when," he told the El Paso Times.

A delegation of students, sponsors and project advisers led by project manager Suzie Azar will leave El Paso Friday morning to see Monday's launch of Discovery at Cape Canaveral, Fla.

The 11 student projects, designed by El Paso and Ysleta school district students, is the first Texas high school payload to fly on a space shuttle.

Casarez, a Hanks High School graduate, said he could not afford a return trip after traveling to Florida in April to deliver the student experiments to National Aeronautics and Space Administration technicians.

Azar, who has nursed the student project since the late 1970s, said Casarez agreed to attend the launch after project sponsors offered Wednesday night to help finance the trip.

The student's laser will test the effects of the weightless environment of space on the accuracy and concentration of the laser's beam.

Measuring eight inches long, the project also will monitor performance and compile data that Casarez later will compare with data from ground experiments.

Casarez figures his project may help pinpoint the accuracy of dye lasers in measuring distance between two objects in space.
