AIDS

Syndrome kills 4 TDC inmates; 4 others have related symptoms

Associated Press
HUNTSVILLE — Four Texas convicts have died of acquired immune deficiency syndrome in the past 14 months, and four other cases have been diagnosed among the prison population, officials said Monday.
 Dr. Michele McDermott, chief of the Texas Department of Corrections' medical staff, said half of the victims were homosexual and the others drug users.
 Four other inmates have AIDS-related complex, a precursor of the syndrome, McDermott said. The disorder does not necessarily mean the patients will develop AIDS, which breaks down the body's immune system, she said.
 McDermott said it is impossible to determine if the victims contracted AIDS in prison.
 But she said eight cases among a population of 38,000 inmates does not represent a high incidence of the deadly disease.
 Since the disease was diagnosed in 1979, there have been more than 12,250 recorded cases of AIDS, including about 6,189 deaths, according to the Centers for Disease Control in Atlanta.

Prison doctors diagnosed the first case of AIDS in August 1983, McDermott said.
 The four surviving inmates with AIDS are males between 20 and 30, she said. They are being housed in separate rooms in infirmaries at the Ramsey III and Darrington Units in Brazoria County, south of Houston.
 "They really are very much separated from the general population," she said.
 When they need treatment they are taken to the TDC Hospital in Galveston, she said.
 McDermott said one of her patients — a 29-year-old man from Kentucky — illustrates the plight of a prisoner afflicted with AIDS.

"He's facing death," she said.
 "He's a young man. He's separated from his family and unable to have the sort of family support that some patients have."
 "He can't read or write, so he's isolated in another sense, and that's a very significant problem for him. He would love to have someone sharing a room with him so he could talk things over. Having peer support is very important."

Number of female virgins in college rising, study says

Associated Press
NEW YORK — The sexual revolution has "bottomed out," according to a sociologist who says his 21-year study indicates more college women are virgins today than in the 1970s.
 During the '70s, college women tried to imitate the carefree masculine attitude toward premarital sex, says Robert Sherwin, professor of sociology at Miami University in Oxford, Ohio. He and colleague Sherry Corbett studied sexual behavior on that campus over 21 years, interviewing more than 3,000 students.
 In 1963, 75 percent of the women they interviewed were virgins. By 1978, that percentage had plunged to 38, nearly equal to that of their male counterparts. But in 1984, the trend began to reverse again, with 43 percent of the women reporting themselves to be virgins, compared to 28 percent of the men.

 Among the reasons Sherwin found for more conservative sexual behavior were fear of social diseases, and the fact that the diaphragm, which has become the preferred method of birth control, "doesn't easily lend itself to unplanned bursts of passion."
 So Sherwin in the September issue of Glamour magazine says, the sexual revolution has "bottomed out."
 Sherwin said that this doesn't mean society is heading back to the standards of the 1950s, when women were expected to remain chaste until their wedding night.
 "Today, I think we're getting a relaxing of both extremes, allowing for more self-expression," he said.
