The scandal involving Texas A&M quarterback Kevin Murray (above) is just one example of what may be becoming an epidemic in the Southwest Conference — money for nothing, cars for free.

SWC coaches' problems 'run on super unleaded'

There's trouble, big trouble, in River City. That's trouble with a T, which rhymes with C which stands for CARS.

The rivers in question are the Colorado, Pecos, Brazos and Trinity. The cities in question are Austin, Lubbock, Bryan, and "Big D."

The cars in question are the Datsuns, Trans-Ams, Camaros, BMWs and Mercedes Benzes found in the parking lots outside most athletic dormitories in the Southwest Conference.

And inside these dormitories, trouble is increasingly being spelled with a capital NCAA.

"I don't know what recruiting is like in the SWC," Penn State Coach Joe Paterno said earlier this year, "but I hear it's another world down there."

Not really. It just often runs on super unleaded.

As many as four SWC athletic programs are reputedly under investigation, or soon will be, for recruiting and rules violations. SMU has already been locked in the garage for their indiscretions.

And whether the allegations involve cars and cash (A&M and TCU), cars and apartments (Texas), cars and free trips to running water (Texas Tech) or cars and lifetime security for friends and family (SMU), the common ingredient was CARS.

It's time to see where all these cars came from and where they are going.

To begin with, the SWC itself is different from every other major athletic conference in the country because of the close proximity of all the schools.

With the exception of the University of Arkansas, all the SWC schools are located within Texas. All of them recruit primarily out of Texas high schools and the competition for the available talent is naturally more intensified than in conferences spread out over a number of states.

Additionally, the SWC has been blessed with a balance that has seen all conference schools, except Tech, as Cotton Bowl representatives in the last 40 years. No one team has been able to es-establish itself as the perennial powerhouse that all good Texas athletes want to play for.

This parity has given rise to the number of alumni accustomed to winning and winning big. They feel a "quick fix" is all their alma maters need to pave their roads to Dallas.

The result is pressure, big pressure, on coaches who know they have to win to keep their jobs.

So how do they cope with their ultimatums? Evidently, they cheat. Or, at the very least, they ignore what's going on.

A&M Coach Jackie Sherrill responded to the recent Kevin Murray "payola" scandal by keeping mum. Sherrill stated officially and unofficially that he knew nothing of what was possibly happening within his program.

He then stated that what has happened or could possibly happen in the future is now out of his hands and he will concentrate on what he knows best — coaching football.

TCU Coach Jim Wacker responded that head coaches do have the responsibility to keep tabs on recruiting and rules violations because the coaches have access to the most information and have the most to lose in any NCAA investigation.

Wacker then dismissed seven players, including six starters and a potential Heisman Trophy running back, for accepting cars and cash payments from TCU boosters.

He was immediately hailed by media nationwide as a courageous "Mr. Clean," willing to sacrifice short-term success for long-term standards.

However, reports out of Fort Worth Sunday indicate Wacker knew about the rules violations since last November and looked into the matter just closely enough to overlook the violations.

Now, Wacker looks less like the "Ti-D-Bowl Man" and more like a shrewd gambler, who tried to offset his losses by confessing and hope-fully hopping away from the NCAA — penalty-free.

Therefore, the idea that coaches are best qualified to oversee violations because they have the most to lose is nullified by the fact that they have the most to gain — good records, national publicity and happy alumni.

Players can't be trusted to oversee themselves any more that children locked in a candy store could be expected to starve to death while not touching the bon-bons.

The fans would love to help, but they are the folks who started the problem with win-at-all-costs priorities in the first place.

And finally, the NCAA has proven, both now and in the past, its total ineptitude in rules enforcement and cannot be considered a factor in anything other than the assessing of punishment after the cheaters have already been turned in.

So, the answer to the dilemma seems to lie in the responsibility and education of all parties involved — fans, coaches and athletes.

Fans must learn to be less demanding, coaches must learn to be more discerning and athletes must learn to recognize the sacrifices they are making for some glory-hungry alumnus for whom they really are — blank checks for empty collegiate careers.

Athletes caught drawing a paycheck for giving the "old college try" leave school without championship rings or trophies, having blown one last chance to play football just for the fun of it.

They initiate themselves to the pressures of pro ball four years early.

As for the alternatives, we hear what we see around us now in the SWC — allegations and counter-allegations, accusals and denials, dismissals and probations.

And lots and lots of cars.
