Swiss and French teams tunneled farther into the collapsed Juarez Hospital, once a 12-story tower complex, where two babies and some adults have been found alive since early Monday.

They still were trying to reach the head of the teaching staff, Dr. Gilberto Lozano Saldivar, who spoke to them Tuesday from under the debris.

About 900 people were believed trapped in the hospital by the quakes.

Communications, transportation and education were creeping back to normal Wednesday, but city officials said at least 2 million people still were without drinking water. Most are in the southern part of this huge urban sprawl of 18 million people.

U.S. Ambassador John Gavin said late Tuesday that the United States was delivering 800 water tanks of 3,000-gallon capacity, vehicles to carry them and water purification tablets.

The Social Security Institute said the last of hundreds of bodies were removed from its old baseball field, where survivors had gone to identify dead relatives. The bodies were taken to public cemeteries for burial in mass graves.

Spokesman Jorge Humberto Morales said the field was being cleaned and fumigated, and 170 field tents would be put up as shelter for the homeless.

Only about half of the estimated 300,000 homeless people in the city were reported to be in public shelters by Tuesday.

Officials said food supplies were adequate, but more than a dozen stores had been closed because of price-gouging. Some stores were charging 400 pesos for a kilogram of tortillas — 2.2 pounds. That is 33

Schools had been scheduled to reopen Wednesday, but the Education Department said they would remain shut until Monday. Spokesmen said 37 of the approximately 4,000 schools would be demolished and 222 would need major repairs.

De la Madrid pledged "total honesty" in distribution of foreign contributions for earthquake relief and for the national recovery fund, which has received approximately $12 million so far.

Government officials said money is the most critical need. "We don't need blankets. We do need money to rebuild the city, to rebuild the schools. Tell them that," one said.

Mexico's economy is strapped by recession and a foreign debt of $96 billion, second only to Brazil in the developing world.

Bilingual education criticized

Associated Press

WASHINGTON — U.S. Secretary of Education William J. Bennett said the government's bilingual education program has failed and should be changed to put more emphasis on teaching foreign students English.

Schools have been spending too much time and too many resources to teach in Spanish and other foreign languages, he said in a speech prepared for delivery Thursday in New York City before the Association for a Better New York. The text was made available in advance.

Bennett charged that "after sound beginnings" in the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965, the federal policies governing bilingual education "went astray." Too many children have failed to become fluent in English.

The government has funneled $1.7 billion in bilingual education aid to school districts since 1968.

Federal civil rights officials in the 1970s began pressuring school districts to teach students with limited English in their native tongue and until 1984 forbade schools from using the funds for classes that relied solely on intensive English instruction.

"After 17 years of federal involvement, and after $1.7 billion of federal funding, we have no evidence

U.S., Soviet relations

While the two apparently did not agree on any outstanding issues, they clearly made an effort to emphasize that they got along well in the talks, which ran 20 minutes longer than scheduled.

They shook hands and smiled broadly at one another, both before and after stepping to microphones on the sidewalk in front of the mission; and each listened patiently as the other addressed reporters.

Before the discussion, Shevardnadze told Shultz, "I'm sorry," for not attending a U.N. General Assembly meeting Monday where the American secretary of state spoke. The Soviet foreign minister said his schedule was too full.

In addition to Shultz, the American delegation at the meeting at the Soviet U.N. mission included Robert C. McFarlane, national security adviser, and Paul H. Nitze, special arms control adviser to Reagan. The presence of both underscored the importance the administration attached to the meetings, especially in its potential for signaling a breakthrough in the Geneva arms talks.

that the children whom we sought to help — that the children who deserve our help — have benefited," Bennett said.

He said the administration would not "give up on the promise of equal educational opportunity" for these children, but it also will not "continue down the same failed path . . . (and) throw good money after bad."

In Washington, Reagan said he is ready to discuss in detail "a serious proposal" about reducing nuclear weaponry. But the administration made it clear the real bargaining should be reserved for the Geneva negotiations.

Other U.S. officials did not disguise their hopes that Shevardnadze would unveil a new Soviet initiative to break the impasse at the arms control talks.

A breakthrough at the arms control talks could help ensure the success of the Reagan-Gorbachev summit. But Soviet officials were keeping Washington guessing on whether Shevardnadze carried such a plan.

Speaking for Shultz, State Department spokesman Charles Redman said Tuesday that U.S. officials had detected from Shevardnadze's U.N. speech Tuesday an indication that Moscow planned to unveil a new proposal in Geneva soon.

But a Soviet spokesman said the foreign minister had only been referring to proposals already made and which Washington has rejected.

He said he would make regulatory and administrative changes "to allow greater flexibility for local school districts," and make sure that civil rights agency does "not impose a particular method of instruction." He also said he will "explore with Congress the possibility of removing the four percent cap on alternative instructional methods."

Aggies to explore outer space

astronaut, he will not undergo astronaut training. Instead, he will have about 100 hours of habitability training to help him adjust to everyday functions such as eating and sleeping while in the shuttle.

Aldridge will begin his training for the mission in October. While he is in the Houston area for training, Aldridge said he hopes to come to College Station to see a few football games.

"I'm delighted to be in such close proximity to A&M," he said.

Aldridge said he had no idea he'd someday be travelling in space back when he was a second lieutenant in Squadron 7 in the Corps of Cadets in 1960.

"My number one priority was to graduate," he said.

After graduating from A&M, Aldridge, a native of Shreveport, La., earned a master's degree in aerospace engineering from the Georgia Institute of Technology in 1962. He worked in various defense-related industries until being appointed by President Reagan to his present position as the second highest-ranking official in the Department of the Air Force.

Aldridge, who was awarded the College of Engineering Distinguished Alumni Award in May, also serves on Texas A&M's Space Advisory Committee, a group that helps direct the growth of space research at the University. In addition, Aldridge is a member of President Vandiver's new Select Committee to advise the administration on the role of a Corps of Cadets commandant.
