Student mediation service helps with solving conflicts

By LINDA SIPPOLA Reporter

Texas A&M University students are helping other A&M students resolve conflicts without going through tedious and often expensive legal processes.

The Student Mediation Service offers trained student mediators as impartial third parties in student-to-student conflicts.

Conflicts the service deals with range from legal or property disputes to roommate disputes.

"Student mediation is a way for students to avoid the legal process," says Jan Winniford, assistant director of student affairs.

After the case is accepted for mediation, the student is interviewed by one of the case coordinators. The student is asked to contact the other student involved in the conflict.

Students often feel their privacy is invaded if they are first contacted by someone not involved in the problem, Winniford says.

If both parties agree to mediation, two of the 10 student mediators are assigned to the case.

"Mediation is something that both parties have to want," Winniford says.

Once mediation sessions are scheduled, the students involved meet with the mediators individually and collectively. Each party gives its side of the problem and suggests a compromise.

Individual sessions are held to allow the students to say anything they feel should be known but did not want to say in front of the other student.

The compromises come from the students, not the mediators.

"Student mediators simply try to point out where the two sides are similar and help them find a compromise," Winniford says.

Mediators remain neutral and do not offer suggestions or advice to either party.

When a compromise is reached, a written agreement is signed by the students involved and the student mediators. The case coordinators do a follow-up to determine if the case needs additional mediation.

Although the Student Mediation Service was started last spring, it has not gained widespread attention on campus.

"Apparently other colleges and universities have had the same problem," Winniford says.

The coordinators of the mediation service hope students about the service will word to other students.

Any student wanting a service must fill out an available in Room 108 building. Applications available at the OCC, the Student Activities or the legal advisers' office.

The Student Mediation available to all A&M student groups without an intensive 18-hour training to prepare them to aid resolving conflicts.

Mediators receive no college credit for their they are asked to make a commitment of one year when the job.

Student parking changes for home football game

The University Police is reminding students of parking regulations in effect this weekend for the football game.

The A&M Motor Vehicle Regulations state that "All vehicles registered by students must be moved from Parking Areas 57, 46, 48, 49, 56, 60, 62, 63 and 69 by 10 a.m. on days when there is a home football game."

These areas include staff, student, and park and ride lots surrounding Kyle Field.

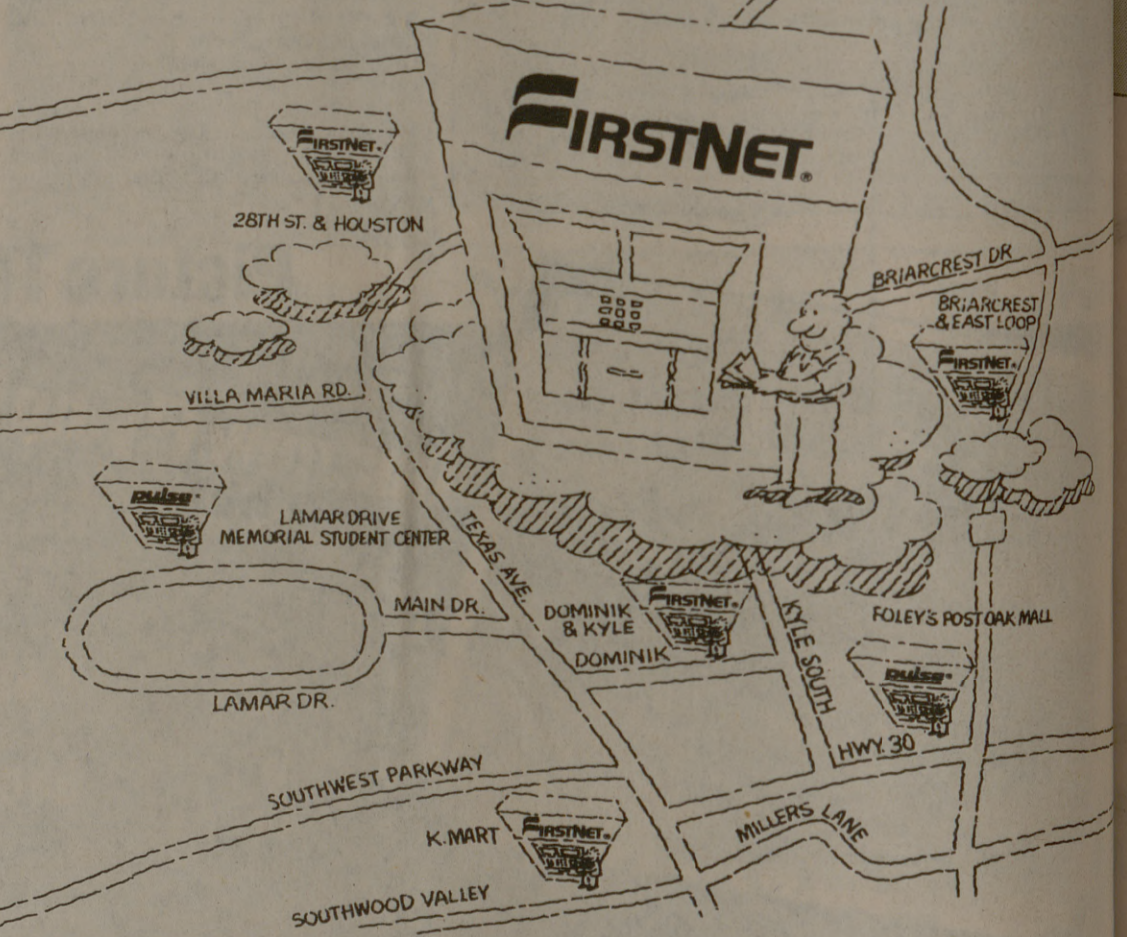

Also included are the Rudder lot and lots bordering the Intranatural Complex and sen Field.

Students who do not their cars before 10 a.m. ticketed.

Cars may be parked in faculty, staff or day spots or in on-street spaces with exceptions: parking areas 58, 75, all reserved spaces, 24-hour reserved handicapped spaces, the course lot and random spaces immediately south of the
