'Studying abroad can impress future bosses'

By MOLLY PEPPER
Reporter

The study abroad program is a big plus to have on your resume. Because while having a degree is the norm, having studied abroad shows a desire to experience different environments, Cathy Schutt, academic services secretary, says.

Schutt added that employers realize students who have gone overseas have better interpersonal skills than those who haven't. Dealing with people from different cultures makes you a better communicator, she said.

Mona Rizk-Finne, study abroad coordinator at Texas A&M, said studying abroad makes a resume stand-out.

Last summer the Study Abroad Office sent more than 200 students on programs to study overseas. Schutt said she expected approximately the same number of students to go this year.

Not all of the programs that the Study Abroad Office sponsors are for study. Students can also choose summer tours which are not for college credit.

Although Schutt was afraid some students might take the tours just for the prestige of studying abroad, she said she's been surprised at the enthusiasm of students who have come into the Study Abroad Office.

"They seem to have something built-up inside them that stimulates them to want to go overseas," she said. "They're not intimidated by it. The culture shock doesn't frighten them off. They have an 'I don't care, I just want to go' attitude."

Schutt said about 10 percent of the students who come into the office don't even worry about getting college credit. Most of the students are graduating seniors who want the academic credit at A&M for these courses, they should see an adviser before they leave, she said.

"A&M is very thorough on credits and they only want the best," Schutt said. "There's a lot of information out there and a lot of institutions, but they're not always going to be transferred back to A&M."

Manal Fares, a junior psychology major, studied in Italy during the summer with one of the liberal arts programs. She said she saw more while on the program than she would have if she had she been traveling independently.

Jeff Cordes, a junior biology and Spanish major, went to Spain last summer on a liberal arts program. He said studying abroad had a profound effect on his life.

"I'm not so narrow-minded," Cordes said, "I can see the perspectives of other people and I can see how they arrive at opinions."

Cordes said the learning environment in Spain could not be reproduced in a classroom at A&M.

"You would have to recreate the last 1,000 or 2,000 years of history," he said. "The thing that is different is not just physical - it's the way of thinking and it's passed on through generations."

Julie Bachman, a graduate student in business administration, studied in Italy as an undergraduate. Now she's trying to do the same thing as a graduate.

She's working through the Council of International Education Exchange, which provides information on graduate schools; study programs and tours abroad.

"I'm looking at trying to get an MBA abroad or do some kind of exchange like I did with my undergraduate work," she said. "I think it was a really broadening experience."

Michael Tagaras, a sophomore aerospace engineering major, said he also hopes to work abroad, but he doesn't plan to study abroad. Tagaras has lived in Europe most of his life. His father is in the military.

He said he travels abroad to learn about a different way of life.

"I see opportunities to learn a different system than what's in America," he said. "I'm not going over there for the money and I'm not going over there to see the sights, because I've already seen them. I'm going because I want to see a new way of interacting with people."

Rizk-Finne said students gain personal, academic and professional rewards from studying abroad.

On the personal level, she said, students see ways of thought that are different from their own.

On the academic level, she said, students experience what they learn instead of reading about it in a textbook.

On the professional level, she said, students learn about the business and educational systems in foreign countries by interacting with students from foreign countries.

But despite the value Schutt said the cost of studying abroad frightens many students.

"Money often frightens people away because of the price of a program," she said.

But Schutt says if you compare the cost of going to summer school away from home to the cost of studying abroad is comparable in cost but not in value.

Schutt says scholarships to study abroad are not available at A&M.

Rotary Clubs often have scholarships for study abroad, she said. Students can apply for these through their hometown Rotary Club.

The MSC Travel Committee has an overseas loan fund for which students can apply. Committee member Kathy Barclay said that last year the committee provided eleven $500 loans.

Students can apply during the fall or spring semester, she said. The next application time will be Jan. 20 to Feb. 14. Students will submit applications and be interviewed by committee members, Barclay said.

Some students would rather spend time overseas studying at foreign universities, Schutt said. She advises students to get an address and write to the university overseas for a complete course description.

Proposed no smoking rules make cigarette lovers fume

Associated Press

AUSTIN — City officials are pondering an ordinance that would limit smoking in public buildings and private workplaces, rules a councilwoman says are proposed on the premise that everyone has the right to breathe clean air.

Supporters of the ordinance say passive exposure to tobacco smoke — such as breathing smoke from someone else's cigarette — is a hazard to nonsmokers.

Limiting smoking in offices, restaurants and other gathering places would follow action taken by Dallas and several other major cities, backers say.

"The ordinance operates under the basic premise that everyone has the right to breathe clean air," said Councilwoman Sally Shipman, who proposed the ordinance along with Mayor Frank Cooksey.

A public hearing has been scheduled for Thursday evening.

The plan submitted by Shipman and Cooksey would forbid smoking in all public buildings and private workplaces, except in areas designated for smoking.

The effort is supported by Friends of Austin Nonsmokers and other groups, including the local chapter of the American Lung Association.

Dr. James F. Pohl, a spokesman for the local lung association, said the city council has the responsibility for making the city a safe place to live and work.

"To eliminate a public danger or nuisance, regulations need to be enacted. . . . Concentration of tobacco smoke in the workplace is often very high, and innocent bystanders suffer the consequences," said Pohl, a pulmonary disease specialist.

One group opposing a no-smoking ordinance in private workplaces is the Texas Association of Business.

Ronnie Volkening, spokesman for the group, said it hasn't studied the city council's proposal, but that the group's feelings "are pretty much the same as when a similar law was introduced in the last session of the Legislature."

The business group argued that the state proposal, which never reached the floor of the Texas House, was unnecessary.

San Antonio, Brown & Root near $750 million settlement

Associated Press

SAN ANTONIO — A $750 million out-of-court settlement with the former contractor of the South Texas Nuclear Project was on the City Public Service board's agenda Monday.

Bob McCullough, spokesman for the city-owned utility, said the board was scheduled to take up a resolution authorizing CPS General Manager J.K. Spruce to sign the agreement.

Such action would clear the way for CPS, one of four utilities that have joined forces to build the nuclear plant, to begin receiving settlement payments.

CPS' share of the settlement is $210 million, which would be paid in quarterly installments of $7.5 million each over a seven-year period.

The CPS board is the first to formally consider ratifying the agreement with Brown & Root, the original contractor for the $5.5 billion nuclear plant near Baytown.

The settlement was reached after the four utilities filed suit in 1981.

Houston Lighting & Power Co. and Central Power & Light Co. of Corpus Christi, two other partners in the project, initially asked for a Public Utility Commission review of the settlement.

"We could have started taking payments Oct. 1," McCullough said, "but we wanted to wait until the PUC decision was worked out."

"If we had gone ahead and settled by ourselves, the PUC could have gone ahead and said the settlement wasn't alright and HL&P and CP&L should go back to court," he said.

Since then, HL&P and CP&L have dropped their request for a PUC review.

The fourth partner, the City of Austin, has not taken formal action on the agreement.
